What are the facts? The law distinctly provides for two boxes, one a ballot box with a slot in it through which the ballots are to be placed. That is sent to the election officers, and the law distinctly provides that when they have counted the ballots they shall roll and seal those ballots, they shall label them, they shall show for whom the votes were counted, and how many votes were received. They shall do likewise with rejected ballots. They, with a copy of the return, together with the poll list, which also shall be sealed, shall be put back in the box and the box sealed and kept by the sheriff for a period of six months.

There shall at the same time be furnished by the sheriff a returning box, and that is what the Senator from Georgia is talking about. There shall be a returning box, and in the returning box shall be placed the returns, a copy of the poll list, and a copy of the registration list.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is this the general election the Senator is talking about?

Mr. HASTINGS. The general election. In that box shall be placed these things, and that box shall be locked, shall be handed to the returning officer, and by him taken to the returning board. It was that box which the supreme court and the attorney general said must be opened by the returning board, and it was from the certificate of returns in that box from which they must figure their totals before they could go to a duplicate that had been sent to the judge of the probate court.

This was Mr. Bankhead's explanation, and this is a remarkable explanation, and this is why I say that from these facts you can not necessarily draw the conclusion which you would draw in ordinary cases from finding half of the seals broken.

Why, Mr. Bankhead says, "Yes; that is the law, but for 25 years the practice in Alabama has been to furnish but one box. I have shown what kind of boxes we got. We got a lot of them with no place to insert the ballots, and the only explanation that I know of that can possibly be made is that they were returning boxes.

Now, I ask the question, What is to be done with a situation like that? The law of Alabama has so clearly and distinctly provided for the purity of the ballot that I doubt whether any other State in the Union is so strict and so careful. They have provided that when the voter comes to vote, the ballot shall be initialed on the small part to be torn off. As I pointed out, that is for the purpose of preventing ballots being brought in from the outside. The voter goes and gets his ballot and it is initialed. He goes into the booth, if it is in the city, under the law, and there he can secretly take his time, but the law says it is a crime to take too much time. They have been so careful as that. It is a crime to stay in there too long. He is given a certain length of time and then he is directed to come out. He comes out with that official ballot, and it goes into a box with a slot in it which is locked. There can not be anything wrong there. In the first place, before the ballot is put in the box it is numbered in ink and the clerk writes down the number and his name. The ballot is folded. Then they have no way to find out how he voted at that time. They can never find out, as I shall point out later. He casts that ballot. If he is on the qualified list, he has a right to that ballot. If he is not on the qualified list, he can make an affidavit showing that he has been in that precinct for a period of three months and in the State for a period of two years; and upon that being shown and upon two neighbors who knew him taking a like oath, he is permitted to cast the ballot.

They open the ballot box and they count the ballots. They make a certificate of what they find. They sign the poll list before they begin to count and seal it up so they can not compare the number on the ballot with the number on the poll list. Then they count the ballots. Those which have been counted are put in one pile, and those which have been rejected are put in another pile. They roll them and then they label them and then they seal them, both the ones that have been received and the ones that have been rejected. There can not be much hoodwinking done up to that point. That is a pretty straight sort of an election up to that point.

Then they put the ballots in the box and they put a seal upon the box, and each election officer writes his name on the seal so it can not be possible for anybody to disturb it. That is done under the law. The box is then sent to the sheriff. Unless there is a contest, it is kept by him for six months, and at the end of six months he is permitted to open the box and destroy the ballots without looking at them. In three counties they were destroyed 30 days after the election. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] said, if I recollect his statement, that one sheriff destroyed them because he was afraid they would be tampered with.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I am even yet unwilling to think the Senator from Delaware wants to be unfair.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not want to be unfair.

Mr. GEORGE. I say, I am yet unwilling to assume it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope so.

Mr. GEORGE. I made no such statement. I said in one case the sheriff, who was going out of office, explained that he burned the boxes because he did not want to leave the ballots after he vacated the office and surrendered possession of the building—not that he was afraid that they would be tampered with.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sorry I made the statement. I did not have the advantage of reading the speech of the Senator from Georgia. It did not appear in this morning's RECORD, and I was speaking from memory with reference to it. I am glad the Senator corrected me with respect to it.

Here is what happened to other boxes: The election officers put in the poll list, they put in the certificate of results, and they put in the list of voters that voted. Those are put in the box and locked. That box, locked as it is, is given to the returning officer and by him taken on Tuesday night to the returning board, which meets on Thursday and makes a canvass of the vote. That is all very simple, that is all very plain, and it would be difficult, it would be very difficult indeed, for any person to commit fraud under such a scheme as that. But I point out how almost impossible it is to detect fraud if it is done the way it was done in Alabama. It is not clear at all whether they used a ballot box or whether they used a returning box. In one instance the woman who testified said that as she voted, the officer raised the lid of the box and put her ballot in there without folding it at all. I do not know to what extent that went on, and that is the reason why I insist upon the rule; that is the reason why I insist that it is the only rule that we can possibly follow when there have been such violations as those affecting various essential things, affecting the purity of the ballot and a correct return. The decisions of the courts and of both bodies of the Congress are full of precedents to the effect that when these conditions arise, we must assume of necessity that it was done for fraudulent reasons and not because the practice was one that had grown up through the years.

Mr. President, I was particularly anxious that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] should hear what I am about to say and I am sorry he is not present at the moment to hear my thoughts with respect to the matter to which I am about to refer.

I sincerely wish it were possible to eliminate every personal and political consideration in determining this matter. To my mind, it is more important than it appears to many who have not closely followed the details. The report which I have prepared is not as complete as it might be. The great amount of work involved is my only excuse. I think the Senate has a real problem confronting it, and a proper determination is of great importance.

We must remember that Senators are elected by the direct vote of the people. When the right of a Senator who comes here with a proper certificate is questioned, the Senate has the duty thrust upon it of deciding the matter. The contestant can with ease comply with the precedents established by the committee relative to the sufficiency of his complaint. He can do as was done in this case, charge fraud in nearly every county of the State. The amount of public money necessary to thoroughly investigate such charge depends largely upon the number of votes involved in the election. In the present case the committee has expended more than $75,000. To thoroughly do the job would probably require three or four times that much; and if it were a larger State, involving ten times as many votes, it would require ten times as much money. What is to be the answer to such a problem? Can it be denied that the contention made by the contestant that he was shut off in the midst of the investigation is wholly unfair and deprives him of his right to establish the serious charges made? It can not. Can it be admitted, on the other hand, that the public is sufficiently interested in determining who was elected to warrant the Senate in expending the large sum of money that may be necessary to definitely ascertain that fact?

My own thought about the matter may be stated as follows:

First. If it should appear that the essential provisions of the law under which the election was held had been violated, I would hold that the particular precinct or district was so tainted with fraud that the vote should not be considered in determining the result, unless a satisfactory explanation of such violation was made and positive proof that no such fraud was committed.

I should only require the contestant to show that some provision of the law essential to the purity of the ballot and the correctness of the count had been violated in the particular district or precinct in question.

The States are in control of their election for United States Senator. They may by their laws throw as few safeguards around their elections as they may see fit; but if they choose the wiser and safer course and provide all the safeguards they can think of, the United States Senate should permit no man to urge as an excuse that such laws are meaningless and to say that elections are not conducted in accordance therewith, but are conducted in accordance with a loose practice that has grown up through the years.

Second. If the districts affected by such essential law violations can be discarded and the will of the people can be determined by counting the votes in the districts not so affected, then the election itself is valid and you determine who receives the greatest number of votes.

Third. If, on the other hand, it should appear that the violation of the essential provisions of the law was a statewide practice and there was not even a pretense of obeying its most vital provisions, the Senate ought to announce to the world that no man can be seated in the United States Senate under such conditions when his seat is contested. What we are asked to do here is to put our stamp of approval upon such unlawful conduct of an election.

Fourth. The refusal of the Senate to approve of such conduct would result in one of two things, the law of the State would be obeyed, or if this were too much of a bother to its citizens, they should see that it was repealed. In case the law was repealed, the Senate would be relieved of the unpleasant duty of declaring there was no election, unless the contestant could affirmatively prove that fraud was committed.

Fifth. In the foregoing suggestions I have entirely ignored the personal knowledge or conduct of the contestee. From my point of view his personal conduct may be beyond reproach. I admit, however, that if he be in control of the party conducting the election, or if he knew and acquiesced in such law violations, it greatly strengthens and makes positive the correctness of the rule which I think should be followed and which I have undertaken to outline.

If I may take the time of the Senate further, I should like to inquire whether or not that statement made by me is justified by the decisions? I invite attention to some of the decisions. In a case in Missouri the court said:

> In Windes v. Nelson (159 Mo. 51–66) the court said:
> "Where fraud is proved, it will be presumed to be for the benefit of the party having a majority in such district, especially if the officers of election are of the party in whose favor such a majority is returned."

I start out with that proposition.

In McCrary on Elections (4th Ed., sec. 582–A) the learned author says:

> While it is true that mere irregularities in the conduct of an election, where the will of the voter has not been suppressed or changed, will be disregarded, yet a succession of unexplained irregularities, and a disregard of law on the part of the officials, is sufficient to deprive the ballot box and the returns of the credit to which they are otherwise entitled, and shift the burden upon the party maintaining the legality of the official count.

In People v. Lindsey (80 Colo. 465–480) it was said:

> We have carefully read the record of the entire evidence as presented in the abstracts, and find that it reveals a most regrettable and astounding condition which prevailed during the election, day and evening, a condition which must receive our most emphatic disapproval. The whole conduct of the judges and clerks of election in that precinct shows gross negligence and a total disregard of their official duties.

Again:

> Here it is found by the trial court that many persons who were assisted were not sworn as to their ability, and no record of assistance was kept. If this can be permitted, then the provisions of the law are without avail. It will be possible for any number of voters to market their votes and call in the judges to see that the goods are properly delivered, wherefore this act, made for the preservation of pure elections, will become a machine in aid of corruption.

In a Pennsylvania case it was said:

> Much has been said in the argument on both sides concerning various provisions of the election law, which are claimed to be directory merely—

That is the contention made here—> and though counsel have pressed their respective views upon our consideration with great zeal and ability, still we can not accord to them, either on the one hand or the other, hardly a semblance of assent. On the contrary, we hold that the election law in all its parts means something, and that there is no warrant in precedent or common sense for disregarding it partially or ad libitum. The day has gone by when the "directory plea" can be used as a shield to defend or excuse election officers who have disregarded the law.

We say in concluding this most laborious investigation, covering in fact four cases—the first arising since the passage of the act of 1869, so far as we have been able to learn—that our rulings are in some respects in advance of those prevailing hitherto. But the time has arrived when courts must come to the front, even to the most forward line of the statutes relating to elections. Corruption is around us on all sides. It has seized upon almost every township and municipal office in the land. It has throttled great States and led captive their legislatures. Its creatures have gone up and taken their seats in the high places of the General Government shameless and unshamable. It even has found a permanent abiding in the National Capitol. Popular anathemas may resound from one end of the land to the other; constitutional conventions may put in the mouth of every officer elected hereafter a staggering array of oaths in denial of everything on their part looking like fraud on the elective franchise; but all this, though well, because exhibiting a tendency toward reform, must, in our opinion, fail to bring the desired relief. Human nature is the same to-day as it was yesterday; it will be the same for all time to come. And under a system of government based like ours upon the popular will, where elections are a necessary incident, there will be always as there have been always, lepers who will foul or attempt to foul the ballot box. Well-directed popular denunciation can not stop it; constitutional provisions can not stop it. At best these are but "rivers of Damascus." The only "Jordan" to cleanse from the leropsy is a proper statute, fully, faithfully, and fearlessly administered by the courts.

If that vicious and intensely wicked and dangerous sentiment—"there is fraud on both sides; therefore, let investigation cease"—prevails too long, this fabric of ours, so admired by those thirsting for liberty abroad, so loved by those enjoying it at home, will be tumbling down about our heads before we know it.

Now, let me ask the Senate to be patient enough with me to allow me to read some of the precedents in the Senate and in the other House with respect to this question, and see whether or not I am to be blamed for undertaking to place upon the other side the burden of showing that there is no fraud in this case. Reading from part 3 of the record, the House committee unanimously decided in the case of Butts against Mackey:

Every facility is furnished for fraud, and even where the election officers are honest great frauds may be readily committed without there being any practical means of detecting them. It is indispensable to a fair election that the electors shall be required to vote in the precinct where they reside.

In the case of Platt against Goode, Senator Blackburn states:

The statute of Virginia requires that one of the poll books of election shall be put under cover and seal and sent to the county or corporation court clerk, together with the ballots, inclosed and sealed. There can be no question as to the mandatory character of this statute. Its object is to prevent fraud in tampering with the ballots or alteration of the returns.

The rule laid down and supported by a number of adjudicated cases and applied in several instances by this House does not require that positive proof shall be adduced showing that the ballots have been tampered with. It is sufficient to show that opportunity for such tampering has been afforded. * * * We can not but conclude in the light of the testimony * * * that the vote of Bland and Rives Townships in the county of Prince George should be rejected.

And in the case of Abbott against Frost it was said:

This testimony, we think, clearly shows that many of the plainest and most important provisions of the law were recklessly disregarded, if not purposely disobeyed, by the officers having in charge said election. * * * We are clearly of the opinion that the provisions of the statute which have been so totally and unblushingly disregarded in this case are not merely formal and directory but vital and essential in order to render the election fair and free from fraud or the suspicion of fraud; for we hold it to be the duty of election officers so to conduct the election and everything thereunto appertaining as to as carefully guard against suspicion of or opportunity for fraud as fraud itself. Nothing short of this will satisfy either the spirit or letter of the statute made and enacted to protect and maintain the purity of elections.

And in the case of Gooding against Wilson, Mr. McCrory stated:

I think another rule must be observed. It must appear that the ballots have been securely kept; that they have not been exposed and that there has been no opportunity to tamper with them. This ought to appear affirmatively.

Again, Senator Hoar, when he was in the House, said:

It makes no difference for the purpose of my point whether the ballot box was there in an exposed place for 12 hours or 12 days. Now, I do not claim that there is any evidence here that * * * any person entered it, opened that box, and substituted other numbered ballots for the ballots which it contained. All I have to say is that an adroitness less than that practiced for a less important purpose in many ordinary cases of crime, robbery, burglary, and forgery could easily accomplish that result. Now, we know how eager, how unscrupulous, how adroit, in many instances, are the means which are used to affect political contests. It is not the question whether the friends of the very respectable and very able gentleman who claims this seat did or were capable of doing such a thing * * *. The interests of the sitting Member and of the contestant disappear before a question like this which involves the interests of the American people in the establishment and maintenance of a strict, wise, and safe rule of public policy. It is not merely a question whether the recount was correct; it is a question whether you know and are sure that the thing counted upon the recount was the same thing that was counted or should have been counted at the time the original count was made.

And, again, in the case in New Hampshire of Morris against Hines the opinion of the court concludes:

If at an election of Representative the check list be flung aside and votes are indiscriminately crowded into the ballot box without an inspection by the moderator, it must be obvious to all observing citizens that every evil which the statute was designed to remedy is likely to happen and that two prominent provisions of it will be trampled under foot. Votes so given and received are neither given nor received in conformity to the essential requisitions of the statute and such requisitions being violated the votes must be void. They would be no more void if given viva voce rather than by ballot. If such a neglect of the statute will not render the whole proceedings void, what neglect will have that operation? The whole balloting therefore in this manner is vitiated; no Representative can thus be duly elected.

In a Michigan case the court said:

In determining the title to the county office the vote of a township should be excluded where it appears that in such township the mandatory provision requiring the official ballots to be kept in the custody of an inspector was violated by the appointment of an unofficial person as "instructor" to distribute the ballots, and allowing him access to the voters even after they had entered the booths, although the parties acted in good faith and it is not shown that voters were unduly influenced.

The text writer in Corpus Juris says this:

An election will be vitiated by irregularities which are so numerous that they must be attributed to fraud rather than honest mistake, and although no actual fraud is apparent, yet an election will be invalidated where the whole conduct of the election officers shows such gross negligence and disregard of their official duties as to leave the judicial mind in doubt as to how the election resulted except for such widespread irregularities—

And so on.

It was said by the House committee in the Fifty-third Congress in the case of Moore against Funston:

The difficulty of establishing by legal evidence the existence of a conspiracy, generally great, is increased rather than lessened by the intermingling of politics. That this is so is apparent from the well-known fact that even where an entire community is convinced to a moral certainty that gross frauds have been perpetrated in an election in the execution of a studied effort to defraud, a sufficient amount of legal evidence to convict the suffrage assassins is rarely found, and usually enought of such evidence can not be procured to indict them. All text writers or other law authorities treating of the subject recognize the difficulty of proving a conspiracy by direct evidence; and, as in the case of fraud in general, recognize also the propriety as well as the necessity of proving distinct facts many of them insignificant in themselves, from all of which, however, when sufficient, a firm belief in the existence of the conspiracy or fraud may safely be deduced, and the conclusion may be as safely acted upon. In many cases circumstantial evidence is the only evidence which can be obtained and it is also not infrequently of the most satisfactory and convincing character.

Now, Mr. President, in order that it may not be so difficult to see what could have happened, I want to call the attention of the Senate to some extracts from the testimony. I read first from page 41 of the views of the minority from the examination of one of the inspectors, I think one of the Heflin representatives. Mr. Evins, counsel for Mr. Bankhead, asked this question:

Were you present when the votes were being counted?
Mr. BOBO. Yes, sir.
Mr. EVINS. They were properly counted, were they?
Mr. BOBO. As far as I know they were.
Mr. EVINS. Did you see a certificate of the results made out?
Mr. BOBO. Yes, sir.
Mr. EVINS. That was correct, was it not?
Mr. BOBO. As far as I know it was.
Mr. EVINS. And the only irregularity occurring in that box that you have knowledge of is in relationship to these challenged oaths?

Mr. BOBO. Yes, sir.
Mr. EVINS. And the going out and getting votes?
Mr. BOBO. Yes, sir.
* * * * * * *
Mr. WILKINSON. Did you observe the ballots as they were called and marked "tallied"? Did you have an opportunity to do that?
Mr. BOBO. No, sir; I didn't have an opportunity.
Mr. WILKINSON. Who called them off?
Mr. BOBO. Monroe Aaron called them off.
Mr. WILKINSON. A Bankhead man called them or a Heflin man called them?
Mr. BOBO. It was a Bankhead man.

From the testimony of Mr. DeMott, I quote as follows:

Mr. EVINS. So far as you know they (the ballots) were counted correctly?
Mr. DEMOTT. Yes, sir.
Mr. EVINS. You made no report of any incorrect count?
Mr. DEMOTT. No, sir; no report at all.
Mr. EVINS. Do you remember what the count was for Senator at that box?
Mr. DEMOTT. No, sir. I did know but it is not in my memory now. Not very many though.
Mr. EVINS. But so far as you know the counting was correctly done?
Mr. DEMOTT. Yes, sir.

On the next page from Mr. DeMott's testimony I quote as follows:

Mr. EVINS. Did you see the ballots as they were taken out?
Mr. DEMOTT. Yes, sir. I could not read what was on them; I just saw the ballots. The man that was calling out was up against the counter and here was a stove; they were holding the ballots out this way [indicating].
Mr. WILKINSON. Now, I believe you said it was impossible for you to get behind these men that were calling the tickets to see whether they were calling them correctly or not?
Mr. DEMOTT. Yes, sir. You see the table sits here and a counter here, and there were three men taking them out of the box and another one checking them off and another one calling them, and they were sitting between that table and the counter, and you could not get between them and the counter, and there were show cases on the counter and you couldn't get between them.
Mr. WILKINSON. You don't know whether the results were correct or not?
Mr. DEMOTT. I know what they called out.
Mr. WILKINSON. You took the results of what they called out?
Mr. DEMOTT. I took the results of what they called out; yes, sir.
Mr. WILKINSON. You could not see how the tickets were marked as they were called?
Mr. DEMOTT. No, sir.
Mr. WILKINSON. Who called out the ballots in the box?
Mr. DEMOTT. Grover Hancock.
Mr. WILKINSON. Was he a Bankhead man?
Mr. DEMOTT. Well, I don't know. I don't know how Grover voted, but my supposition of it is that he was a Bankhead man. Arguments we got out of him once in a while, I suppose he was. I wouldn't think he would be for the other fellow.
Mr. WILKINSON. Did he argue for Bankhead?
Mr. DEMOTT. Yes, sir.

Those are merely illustrations showing how it would be possible under the circumstances for the election officers to fix up a return that suited themselves, and then, bearing in mind the practice in Alabama of failing to roll the ballots, failing to seal the box, or using as an excuse that it was the practice to have only one box, and therefore the officers had to open the box, it is easy to see, under these circumstances, how it was possible for them to determine beforehand how many votes they were going to give to a certain candidate and how many votes they were going to give to the other candidate, and then on some subsequent day, before the Senate could reach that box to ascertain whether or not it was correct in all particulars, to substitute other ballots for those in the box. If that were done, it would not be possible for us ever to find out the facts unless some person should come here and admit that he was a party to that fraud. On the other hand, if they followed the law, if they did all that the law required them to do, we would be in a position now to go to the sealed box; we could find there in the sealed box the rolled ballots, also sealed; we could find them properly labeled; we could find them properly numbered; we could compare them and we could count them; and when that was over, there would not be a suspicion left with respect to that particular box; it would be as clear as could be, and the Senate would have no difficulty with respect to it. But when they throw away all the safeguards, when they refuse to use a box, as is required, with a lock on it, and we find in there ballots that have not been folded at all, it means, it is said, nothing in particular. Why? Because they have an excuse for the law not being followed, and an excuse that is consistent with a fair count.

So that is exactly the trouble in this case. It is the trouble in all election cases, and it is the trouble with all election laws. Wherever there is a failure to follow one important requirement, it throws the whole thing out of gear, and it is not possible to go back and trace it and find out just what was done with respect to the matter.

Before leaving this subject I desire to call attention to the absentee ballots.

The absentee ballots in Alabama were one of the important things in that election. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has greatly criticized me because I had accused persons of perjury in connection with the absentee ballots. On page 8775 of the RECORD the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] says:

What is that so-called perjury? The law of Alabama provides that a man who is away from his home at election time—on business, as I recall the law—may be allowed to vote by absentee ballot. The inference is left in the report of the Senator from Delaware that it is necessary for the man to have been continuously abiding directly at the place where he cast the absentee ballot. If that is the law, then I would not be entitled to vote in Alabama, because I have been away from there six or seven months. The chief justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, who has been in Montgomery, Ala., for a long period of years, has retained his citizenship back in his home county. The same thing has occurred with reference to various others. People come to Washington, for instance, and secure positions here. Under the laws of our State they are permitted to vote by absentee ballot. But the charge is made here practically that every person of that kind is guilty of the crime of perjury. I deny it and I resent it. Why, Mr. President, it is not true that a man is not entitled to vote in Alabama if he leaves there for a year or two but keeps his citizenship there. That law is as old as any law of the country. Citizenship is determined largely as a matter of intent. That is what is shown by the absentee ballots.

There is one instance in the record in which it was charged that an absentee ballot was cast for a man by the name of John Moore, who was dead. The vote was challenged, and the officers consulted the chairman of the county committee, the solicitor of the county, and the sheriff, all of whom insisted that if the man's name was on the ballot roll, the certificate of voters, his vote should be counted, notwithstanding there was a man there who challenged the vote, and said that he knew the man was dead. So his vote was counted.

The matter came on here; and one of the first witnesses called in defense was this man who it was said was dead. It turned out that there were two John Moores registered in that particular district. The John Moore in Shelby County, I think, came on the witness stand and said, "I cast that ballot." "How long have you lived in Shelby County?" "I have lived there for five years." That is what he said in his testimony: "I have lived in Shelby County five years, but I vote in this other county." I am not certain that I have my counties straight. "I vote in this other county."

That is but an illustration of what goes on with respect to the absentee ballot in Alabama.

The Senator from Alabama evidently has overlooked one very important thing with respect to this matter, however. Section 366 has some provision touching this subject. Mind you, all that the law provides is that a citizen of Alabama who is going to be out of the State or out of his county on election day, in the regular course of his business, may be permitted to vote an absentee ballot; but there is some limitation.

Section 366 of the law is one of the things that make it quite clear that it is not intended that every person should vote. Here is what it provides:

No person shall lose or acquire a residence either by temporary absence from his or her place of residence without the intention of remaining, or being a student of an institution of learning, or by navigating any water of this State—

And so forth. That shows that it is intended not to bar a person who is temporarily absent. I call your attention, however, to the fact that in Alabama 5 per cent of the vote is by absentee ballot. That is 5 out of every 100; and I ask the Members of the Senate, from their own experience in their own places where they live, if they believe it is possible for 5 people out of every 100 in the State of Alabama to be out of their county or out of their election district on election day in the regular course of their business.

No! No such thing happened. Here is what happened:

In Alabama, after you are 45 years of age, it is not necessary for you to pay a poll tax. The evidence shows that the list is rarely purged. Once on that list, you are always on; and, wherever you are, persons interested in the election in Alabama hunt you up and say that you are entitled to vote in Alabama under their election law.

It is in evidence that a person interested in Mr. Bankhead's election solicited in the adjoining county—in Jefferson County, I think, out of Shelby County—107 persons, taking with him a notary public with the applications in his hand for absentee ballots, although the absentee ballot law distinctly prohibits the probate judge under any circumstances from sending out an absentee ballot unless he receives an application from the person who desires to vote.

But the practice in Alabama was not only that. Not only were the ballots furnished but checks for 25 cents were furnished in many instances in order to pay the notary fees of absentee voters in order to get their votes.

Is that any way to conduct an election? True it is, Mr. President, that if we throw out all the absentee ballots it does not seriously affect this election; and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is asking me to show how they affect this election.

I said day before yesterday that I was the person who suggested that we close this case and not permit additional testimony, and that is true. I suggested that it be closed for two reasons: Because I was satisfied, under the law and under the facts, that sufficient testimony had been produced to warrant the declaration that there was no election in Alabama. In the second place, I concluded that the Senate was not justified in spending all the money that would have been necessary to run down all the charges of fraud in this election. If we do not adopt the rule I suggested we can not be fair to the contestant in any case.

United States Senators are elected by the direct vote of the people. It is not difficult, under the precedents established in the Privileges and Elections Committee, to make out a case of fraud as was done in this case, alleging fraud in nearly every county in the State of Alabama. What are we going to do with a situation like that if we permit the Alabama law to be wiped out, and permit the people there to go and do just exactly what they please, and say, "That means nothing"? The only other way of dealing with the matter would be to appropriate sufficient money to go to every elector in the State of Alabama and put him upon oath and find out how he voted.

Are we bound, under the Constitution, to do anything like that? I submit that we are not. If, however, we adopt the plan I have suggested—which the courts everywhere uphold, and which is in accordance with the precedents long ago established in both Houses—if you adopt the view that when the violations strike at the very heart of the purity of the ballot in any particular case, the burden is placed upon the person who comes here with the certificate, then I say we have done a thing that will save the Senate great annoyance. We have done a thing that is fair to everybody. We have sent out notice to all the States of the land that hereafter they must live up to their laws if they expect the men they send here to be seated. In no other way can we do it.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] wanted me to point out how it was possible to show that Mr. Bankhead was not elected. What shall be done with the 58,817 votes that were not numbered at all? Shall they be thrown out?

Why, of course not. They should not be thrown out unless there was a suspicion of fraud. If there were nothing at all in this case but the failure to number the ballots, I should have long ago gotten rid of it so far as I was concerned, and said there was nothing in this contest. But the failure to number the ballots was mentioned by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the extent of twenty-eight times in his speech, in order, if you please, to draw attention away from the essential things of the law, in order to draw attention to that matter and to emphasize the contention that I had enlarged upon immaterial things. In order to do that he has mentioned twenty-eight times the matters of failing to number the ballots, using a pencil instead of a pen, and folding the ballots instead of doing something else with them.

That is not the essential thing in this statute. That is not true at all, and that is not what I want the Senate to understand from me. I say the essential thing in this statute is that when the votes are counted, they must be rolled and sealed. When they are rolled and sealed, they must be put in a box that is sealed. When the Senate sends to Alabama to get the ballot boxes, and finds those conditions existing, it may be reasonably well satisfied, when it counts the ballots, that there has been no fraud committed. When, however, it finds the seals on half the boxes destroyed and practically none of the ballots rolled and sealed, then I say that that of itself ought to be sufficient to satisfy any reasonable man that the Senate can not afford to put its stamp of approval upon it; but, on the other hand, it must say to the other side, "You must satisfy the Senate beyond all doubt, by some satisfactory evidence, that there was no fraud committed in this particular instance."

Now, I want to refer for a moment to Mr. Bankhead's own position with respect to this matter.

He pleaded yesterday for a judicial decision, and he quoted me as saying that this is the kind of case where the Members of the Senate act as judges and do not act as legislators. With that I fully agree.

I desire to call attention, however, to the fact that before Mr. Bankhead had reached the Senate he had appealed to judges who were not impartial. The committee was greatly shocked to find that Mr. Bankhead himself had proposed to the Alabama Legislature that it pass a law placing the investigation of this election in the hands of the probate judges of Alabama. He came frankly to the committee and said that he had suggested that to the legislature. At the same time he admitted that 61 out of the 67 judges of probate in Alabama were partisans of his.

Oh, yes; the contestee in this case is anxious for an impartial jury to pass upon his case. He was anxious then to have an impartial jury pass upon it. I submit that it comes with poor grace now for him to appeal to the Senate to lay aside its partisanship, to lay aside all things except a judicial attitude upon the case it has before it, when he himself endeavored to have the probate judges of his own State pass upon his case for some reason; I suppose for the reason of having some influence upon the Senate. He stated before the committee that it was for the purpose of aiding the committee.

What is the contestee's position with respect to the polling booths? His own counsel said that he had not heard of any polling booths in Alabama during his lifetime. Here is the leader of the Democratic Party in Alabama insisting that in order to have an honest election, in order to have a legal election in Alabama, it is not necessary to furnish the polling booths provided by law. In other words, he comes before the Senate and admits that, so far as he is concerned, he has acquiesced in that violation, and that important violation, of the law. He was the first man who explained to me this business about the having of two ballot boxes, and admitted that under the law they were required to have a ballot box and a returning box; but he said the practice in Alabama for 25 years was to have but one box.

I call attention in the report to the fact that in some case in which Bankhead & Bankhead appeared—and I assumed that the Senator from Alabama was one of the counsel—it was distinctly stated by the court that it was imperative that two boxes be furnished in Alabama. But here he appears in the Senate and complains of me because I have called attention to the way in which they carry on their elections in Alabama, when he has been a party to that particular violation of the law of Alabama.

Relative to the challenging of absentee ballots, the contention was made that one could not challenge an absentee ballot, and the election officers of Alabama so held. After consulting the chairman of their committee, after consulting the sheriff, and after consulting the solicitor of the particular county, they conclude that one can not challenge an absentee ballot, and they hold that if the absentee voter be on the roll as a qualified elector and his absentee ballot appears, it can not be challenged.

Mr. Bankhead came to my office with respect to that, and I had some argument with him concerning it. He said, "Of course, that is true. Anything else would result in making the absentee ballot law absolutely a nullity, because all a person would have to do would be to challenge every absentee ballot that came in, and instantly that absentee ballot would go out." But upon further investigation I found that shortly before this very election the attorney general had rendered an opinion in which he said that it was the right of the people to challenge absentee ballots, and he called attention to the provision of the constitution of Alabama itself, showing that any law which undertook to provide otherwise was in violation of the Alabama constitution. But Mr. Bankhead insisted that he had no right to challenge an absentee ballot, and that was his idea with respect to observing the law in his own State.

I have already called attention to his attitude with respect to the probate judges, and I have already called attention to the fact of his participation in paying the poll taxes of others. He did not deny that that was a practice in Alabama. All he said was that the other side had produced evidence affecting but two counties in Alabama.

I have already called attention to his attitude relative to the primary, and I think it is not necessary for me to discuss that longer.

Mr. President, I want now to refer to the speech made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and then I will have finished. I want to call attention to some of the things he said which, in my judgment, were a reflection upon me. Before doing so, however, I want to direct attention to the fact that I did not pick this job which I have had for a year. I have represented the United States Senate in it as best I could, and I think it comes with poor grace for some Member of the Senate to accuse me of having in my action some improper motive.

There are just a few things to which I want to call attention. The Senator from Alabama used this language, as appears on page 8694 of the RECORD:

It is my expectation to discuss to-morrow the question of the primary and its effect, but I am glad to have this opportunity, immediately after the discussion by the Senator from Delaware, to reassert that there is no evidence of fraud in this record, unless we have come to the point where we must stoop so low as to view with suspicion every opportunity for the commission of fraud.

Then he said this:

Every time there is a convention to nominate a candidate for United States Senator, or governor, or any other officer—

Talking about Delaware—

there is an opportunity, by undercover methods, which are sometimes used in conventions, to thwart the will of the people. Every time they vote by secret ballot in Delaware in a convention or anywhere else there is an opportunity for fraud.

I want to say to him with respect to that, that, at least, we have not violated any law, and so far as the secret ballot in a convention is concerned, he is talking about the rule of the Democratic Party and not the rule of the Republican Party.

I want to call attention to what the Senator said with respect to the primary, as appears on page 8765 of the RECORD:

We, therefore, must be led to the conclusion that this part of the views of the minority was placed in the RECORD not because the Senator from Delaware believed that it should result in the unseating of the junior Senator from Alabama but because the thought possibly occurred to him that there might be some in the Senate to whom this particular argument would appeal. In other words—

Talking about the primary—

In other words, it is the same proposition that we have heard sometimes with reference to tariff legislation. If the proponents of a certain measure can not obtain the votes by one method, they try another, even if it be necessary to advocate something which personally they do not favor.

I think there was an inference of an improper motive in that which is not worthy of any Senator when referring to another.

I also wish to direct attention to this statement of the Senator, appearing on page 8772:

The mere fact that a pencil has been used instead of a pen time and time again shocks the tender sensibilities of the Senator from Delaware. I suggest that before the Senator goes all the way to Alabama to condemn the voters of that State for using a pencil instead of a pen his services might be useful at home.

Again, referring to the Mayfield case:

They did not reach the stupendous proportions that have been asserted here, in so far as effect is concerned, because the Senator from Delaware, fortunately for the State of Texas, evidently was not the chairman of the committee.

I read from page 8774 what the Senator said, because I happened to refer to the brief filed by counsel instead of the report, and there was very little difference between them:

The Senator from Delaware, driven from his own report by the irresistible facts in this case, as his feet are insecurely placed upon the shifting sands of the charges that pencils were used instead of pens and that the ballots were folded instead of rolled, we find standing on the insecure island of a brief prepared by the attorney for the contestant. No wonder, when the Senator is driven by the irresistible facts from the conclusions which he has reached that he seeks to base an ouster of a United States Senator upon something a lawyer said in the record.

Does anybody agree that that is a fair argument or that it is a fair statement of this case in any particular?

Then the Senator stated the object of elections, and in a sarcastic vein he had this to say:

Always up to the time of this contest it has been supposed that one of the objects of an election was to find out for whom the people voted. We did not know until this contest that the only important thing is whether the ballots were rolled or folded.

I want also to call attention to page 8776 of the RECORD, where the Senator deliberately charged me with undertaking to expose the secrecy of the ballot. This is what he said:

Under the law the ballot is supposed to be secret, but this law to which my friend from Delaware looks up and before which he bows with such reverence and respect when it refers to writing with a pencil instead of a pen is not now so sacred. He is perfectly willing to have the secrecy of the ballot destroyed and so there has been published, and I have it here before me now and can give it to Senators if they want it, a tabulated report of the voters in Alabama disclosing how each voted.

Again, on the same page:

But bear this in mind: The secrecy of the ballot has been done away with. Here is the list for anyone who desires to see it [exhibiting].

I was not in the Chamber when all of that was going on, but I found that the Senator from Nebraska was anxious to find out what that meant, so I undertook to straighten it out, and I called attention to the fact. I said:

Mr. President, I should like to explain to the Senator from Nebraska that the list published does not show how the voter voted so that anyone getting hold of a list outside of the parties interested themselves could ascertain the fact. It does not disclose how persons voted. I thought the Senator from Nebraska would be interested in knowing that. However, we did have a supervisor check the vote and give to the interested parties the confidential information contained, but that was not given to the public. I thought the Senator from Nebraska might be concerned about that point.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not quite understand; perhaps I did not get the explanation which the Senator from Delaware has made.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the first place, there was given the number of the voter and his name. That is all that was published and that is all that appears in print. That does not show how the individual voted.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that——

Mr. BLACK. They were supplied the list; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There was a slash before the name of one candidate and a cross before the name of the other.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Delaware is explaining that the information was not given out to the public, but that there was given to the contestant and the contestee the information with marks in front of the names to show how individuals had voted.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I was interested in having the Senator from Nebraska understand.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. President, I called attention also to this statement made by the Senator from Alabama with respect to the opportunity for fraud:

> But, as they look with their microscope, they come back into the Senate and say on the Senate floor, there was an opportunity for fraud in Alabama, therefore we ask you to clear Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I do not believe I will go further into that, for I am not certain but that I have covered that point. I have given my idea about fraud. But in order that I may show how fair the Senator was in his argument I want to direct attention to two or three other little things.

He has much to say about the rejected lists and tries to explain it by saying:

> It may be that it is the voter's wife and that her name appears upon the poll list as "Mary Jones." She may be known as "Mrs. J. E. Jones." They write her name as "Mrs. J. E. Jones." The Senator from Delaware and his supervisors have taken out every name where it does not correspond in that way, and they class such names as illegal voters. We have here in the record the lists of the voters from two counties classified by the Senator from Delaware as illegal. I have in my hand a report made by the probate judge of Colbert County. He shows that out of 44 names which have been classed as illegal by the Senator from Delaware, all but three are qualified voters in that county, and he did not take the time to go out and hunt up the particular three.

The only report we know anything about shows that 71 clerks were illegal voters and after much effort the probate judge showed that 22 might be legal voters. But the Senator called attention to one instance in particular, R. R. Moton, and contends that the ballot was thrown out because the word "doctor" was written in front of the name. He was correct about that, but it seems to me he ought not to pick out one particular name and make a great ado about it when it is purely and clearly a mistake. This was a very large job and undoubtedly there were such mistakes made. But the count, so far as we could ascertain, was absolutely correct.

The Senator referred to the fact that there was no evidence of seals being broken. As I understand it, he is now talking about the ballots that were rolled and sealed. He said it has not been shown that those seals on the ballots so rolled have been broken. How could we prove a negative like that? If they never were rolled and never were sealed, how would it be possible for us to come here and show that the seals were broken? The very thing we are contending is that they were not broken, because they were not sealed in the first instance.

There is one other thing which I think ought to be called to the attention of the Senate. I started to do it the other day, and the Senator from Georgia complained and said he would have to qualify my statement if I made it. This is an important thing. The list was made up some two or three weeks ago, was handed to counsel on both sides, and handed to me. A total of 554 persons served as election officers whose names were not found on the qualified list of electors, representing 444 election districts. It is contended on the other side that with an opportunity given they could show that many of the 544 names were qualified voters.

Let me repeat, if it be necessary to show what was a qualified voter in Alabama, that he must be on the certified list April 15, which is published. However, if he does not appear on that list and ought to appear, he is given until the 1st day of May to get himself placed upon the list and at that time a second list is published. He must have lived in the State two years and in his district three months before he is permitted to vote. The law declares that the election officers shall be selected, 20 days before the election, from the list of qualified voters of the district, and that list shall be published to the world 20 days before the election.

The law only provides two ways of finding out who are qualified voters. The first and most natural way is to find out whether the man is on the list. If he be not on the list, but has a right to vote, then he goes to the polling place on election day. He must make an affidavit and he must get two of his friends to make an affidavit that he is a qualified voter. In my judgment he is not a qualified voter until he makes his affidavit and is placed upon the list. In my judgment he can not be selected as an election officer unless he appears on that list. Otherwise, he could not be qualified, because there is no way to qualify him except for the election officers themselves to place him on the list on election day, and there are 544 of them that were not qualified electors.

If I was going to show that a conspiracy existed here, if I was undertaking to show there was fraud running through all of this election, I ask what would be a better way of doing it than to show that 544 people were selected, perhaps because they were skilled in the art of manipulating elections, and placed wherever the manipulators wanted to place them so they could do the job in the way they were directed to do it. There were 544 of them not on the list, and in my judgment not qualified electors and, therefore, not qualified to be officers. Can anybody conceive of an easier way or can anybody conceive of a thing that would attract more attention in the State of Pennsylvania if we showed it than that? I contend that we ought to apply the same rule below the Mason and Dixon line that we apply above the Mason and Dixon line, and when we do that we will have less trouble in the Senate with respect to the contests that come here.

In the Pennsylvania case under the leadership of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], it was declared that where they found some fraud, although they threw out votes and although Vare was left with a majority, the whole thing was so tainted that the only reasonable conclusion which could be properly reached was that there was no election on that day. If that be the precedent, if that be the rule provided by the other side of the Chamber, then I beg of them not to come here and complain and accuse me of preparing a report based upon mere flyspecks, upon technicalities discovered with a microscope.

I resent any such suggestion, because what I have done has been to the best of my ability and with the honest belief that it was my duty to lay the facts before the Senate. Having done it, I care not what any other man does, but I do not propose, so far as my vote goes, to put my stamp of approval upon any such conduct.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am going to detain the Senate but a few moments. I do not intend to debate the question at length. I am unwilling, however, in a matter of this importance to cast my vote without explaining briefly the reasons which urge me in the casting of it.

As I understand the question, and I have attempted to understand it from listening to the debates and reading the records, there is a question, first, as to whether or not there was a legal primary in Alabama, and, second, whether there was a legal election in Alabama. I understand from the address of the chairman of the subcommittee on Privileges and Elections [Mr. HASTINGS] that there is no question as to whether Senator Heflin or Senator Bankhead was elected. I understand that in no event can Senator Heflin be seated under these proceedings. Senator Bankhead received a majority of the votes.

As a primary question, sir, I do not believe the constitutional provision empowering us to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of United States Senators refers to any proceeding looking to the nomination of a candidate to be voted for at an election. At the time the Constitution was framed there was no such thing anticipated as a primary election; in fact, no such things as parties were anticipated. At the time the Constitution was framed it was provided that Senators should be elected by the legislatures of the States, and there was no provision for electing legislatures; that was left entirely to the States. In fact, under the Constitution the States were expressly granted the power to determine the times, places, and manner of holding elections for United States Senators. That has only been changed, to my knowledge, by the seventeenth amendment, which provides for the election of Senators by the people rather than by legislatures.

I agree with the decision in the Newberry case, wherein the Supreme Court held that the word "election" in the Constitution of the United States does not refer to a procedure, whether it be by caucus or convention or primary, for the nomination of candidates to be voted on at the election. Therefore, I believe that we have no right to go into a primary election for the purpose of determining what candidate was selected as a nominee to be voted on at the general election.

It is apparent, however, that under the authority to determine the "qualifications" of United States Senators, we have the right to look into the conduct of a Senator in a primary; we have the right to look into his conduct before or after the primary; in other words, we have the right to examine his conduct at any time, in any particular, in any undertaking, to determine whether or not he has the qualifications of a United States Senator, and it has been determined by this body more than once that the word "qualifications" includes moral qualifications. There is no doubt that if we believe that a candidate in a primary or in a convention or otherwise was guilty of corruption or fraud, we would have a right to take that into consideration and to decide that he has not the qualifications to be a Member of this body.

The second question raised, and which we must determine, is whether or not there was an election in the State of Alabama. It is not a question as to whether Mr. Heflin or Senator Bankhead was elected at that election; the question is, Was there an election in Alabama? As I have previously said, section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States grants to the States the right to determine the times, places, and manner of holding elections, with certain qualifications, and I feel that before this body, in a collateral case, should determine that there was no election in a State, there should be the strongest affirmative proof of that fact. If this case involved only the election of a Senator, it would not be so important; but we can not declare that election absolutely void; we can not declare that there was no election in the State of Alabama without declaring that it is our opinion that the governor of that State was not elected; that the attorney general was not elected; that none of the legislators were elected; that none of the State, county, or municipal officers were elected. Therefore, it becomes a serious question of determination, in my mind, at least. I am totally unwilling to take the responsibility, in a collateral proceeding, of determining that there was no election in the State, unless the proof to my mind is conclusive.

I regret to be compelled to say that the evidence in this case discloses the fact, in my opinion, that the laws of the State of Alabama with regard to the protection of the voter by guaranteeing a secret vote appear not to have been enforced; it may even appear to me that some of the laws are not good laws; but what right have I, as a citizen of the State of Nevada, to criticize the character of laws that the State of Alabama has, when the Constitution has granted to the State of Alabama the same right which it has granted to the State of Nevada—the right to determine the manner of holding its own elections. To me the evidence discloses the fact that by reason of the failure to enforce the statutes of their own State the people of Alabama have opened wide the door to fraud, but I fail to find from the evidence in this case any general fraud even under the peculiar circumstances existing. I fail to find that there has been such an advantage taken of the opportunity for fraud that in my conscience and my judgment I can say that that whole election was so fraudulent that there was no valid election in the State of Alabama.

Mr. President, viewing the situation as I do, and having to vote upon the sole question, as I do here, as to whether or not there was a legal election in the State of Alabama, notwithstanding the technical failure to protect the voter as it was intended, by affording him a booth where he could have an opportunity secretly to mark his own ballot, to have it properly folded and sealed, to have it properly preserved, in the absence of evidence of general fraud throughout the State and, indeed, of fraud of any character or kind which may be attached to the contestee in this case, I am unable in conscience and in view of my opinion of the law to vote to declare that there was no election in the State of Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 199, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and others asked for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. I understood that there was to be a substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] for the pending resolution. He does not seem to be present at the moment. Can any Senator now present give the Senate any idea as to what the understanding was as to that?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has not indicated that it was his purpose to offer a substitute. I had understood that the vote would come on the pending resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood from conversation with the Senator from Delaware that he expected to offer a substitute for the resolution. I assume that the vote on a substitute would come first. He is not in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Patterson
Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Pittman
Bailey	Couzens	Jones	Reed

Coolidge	Hebert	Oddie

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to offer a substitute for the pending resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the pending resolution, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it is the sense of the Senate that there was no legal election for United States Senator in Alabama in 1930, and that the seat now held by JOHN H. BANKHEAD is hereby declared vacant.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. ASHURST, and others asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I understand that if present he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I am free to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. VANDENBERG (when his name was called). On this question I have a special pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is absent from the country on official business. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is necessarily absent from the Senate and from the city. I am unable to secure a transfer. Therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], who, if present, would vote "yea."

The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], is still detained from the Senate in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—19

So Mr. HASTINGS's resolution, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the original resolution, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 199), as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN H. BANKHEAD is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1931, and is entitled to a seat as such.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], and withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. I make the same announcement that I made a while ago as to my pair and its transfer.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], who, if present, would vote "nay."

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the pending amendment being the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the committee amendment, on page 90, line 1, where the committee proposed to strike out the following:

Public works: For establishing and improving aids to navigation and other works as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $449,708, to be immediately available.

The Senator from California moved to amend by inserting in lieu of the language proposed to be stricken out the following:

For establishing and improving aids to navigation, establishing lights, and for signals to mark the deep-water channel to Stockton, Calif., $16,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is about to offer an amendment in lieu of the amendment which I offered when last we were considering the pending bill, which, as I understand it, will be acceptable. I trust the Senator will present the amendment which he has in hand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Chair to understand the Senator from California to have withdrawn his amendment which was pending?

Mr. JOHNSON. Temporarily: yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have looked into this matter very closely and examined with reference to the amount of money carried in the bill for immigration purposes, and I think we can well afford to substitute $50,000 for the amount proposed to be appropriated, with the distinct understanding that $16,000 of the amount may be used for aids for navigation in the channel leading up to Stockton, Calif., without mentioning the point. I make that declaration clearly, that $16,000 of this money is intended to be used for that purpose. That will take care of the situation without changing the amount carried by the bill, and I think we can very well make that change. Therefore I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in place of the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, upon the statement of the Senator from Washington that $16,000 of this amount shall be used in the Stockton Harbor for signals and lights and as aid to navigation, I am perfectly willing to accept it in lieu of the amendment I offered, and I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California withdraws his amendment to the committee amendment, and the Senator from Washington offers the amendment which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 90, line 1, the Senator from Washington proposes to restore the matter stricken out, amended to read as follows:

Public works: For establishing and improving aids to navigation and other works as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $50,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not intend to oppose the amendment; I want to see the project of the Senator from California taken care of. I would like to ask, however, whether these aids to navigation are to be restricted and limited all over the country? There are a good many of those propositions in Florida. There are waters on the Gulf and on the Atlantic and inland where the people are asking for aids to navigation. I do not know whether there will be enough money to supply the necessary aids or not.

Mr. JONES. The Senator will remember that, according to the letter from the Secretary of Commerce, he really suggested that this appropriation could be cut out with less harm than would result from cutting out appropriations for many other things. We have proposed an appropriation of $50,000 for this item, and when the $16,000 is deducted, $34,000 will be left for additional lights anywhere throughout the country, and I think under the circumstances that appropriation is ample.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I wanted to inquire of the Senator, whether fixing the appropriation in this amount would mean the abandonment of aids now in existence, or which it is necessary to complete.

Mr. JONES. No; it will not mean the abandonment of any aids now in existence.

Mr. FLETCHER. There will be funds for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. Yes; $34,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

TRANSACTIONS ON THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the debate which has been proceeding for the last several days, though perhaps I should have earlier called attention to a newspaper report which apparently has been broadcast over the country in connection with the purported interview I had with a newspaper representative. However, I received a copy of the interview and the first information of its publication on yesterday morning. The information came by way of a bulletin from Dow, Jones & Co., of New York City. The interview relates to the investigation of the New York Stock Exchange. I notice that Dow, Jones & Co. send out financial bulletins, and they characterize these bulletins as the "Electric Page News, printed in over 100 cities." Dow, Jones & Co., of course, is an organization which reports respecting the New York Stock Exchange.

I call the Senate's attention to the fact that the other day Mr. LAGUARDIA, a Member of the House of Representatives from New York, appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency and outlined some of the high-pressure methods used by operators on the New York Stock Exchange and by some of the brokerage houses in their operations in the sale of stocks and bonds.

My interview had reference, not to the statement of Representative LAGUARDIA, but to the general conditions which exist respecting the New York Stock Exchange. However, the reporter who obtained the interview with me was slightly in error, and I desire to correct the error before I proceed to outline a situation which I think ought to be called to the attention of the country.

In the purported interview the newspaper representative stated:

"The public," said Senator BLAINE, "is at all times the sucker."

That is not my conception of the public. That is not the language I used. The language I did use was that brokerage houses and others engaged in the type of gambling which is transacted on the New York Stock Exchange conceive the public at all times to be the suckers.

In the same interview I stated:

Professional traders never lose to the public, although they may lose among themselves.

That is a fair and, I think, an accurate statement of the situation. These operators are very much like the racketeers and gangsters about whom we have heard so much. However, they are the gentlemen who are clothed in holy robes; and Mr. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, undertook before the committee to place the character of angels about the operators on the New York Stock Exchange. Yet, after all, the operations on that exchange are similar in character to the operations of the racketeers and gangsters who may kill one another. So these operators on the stock exchange may occasionally lose among themselves, but their main purpose is to gouge the public, to cheat the public, to defraud the public.

Mr. President, it was demonstrated by Representative LAGUARDIA that many of those who operate on the New York Stock Exchange use high-powered publicity methods. In respect to one news-gathering or news-reporting service there was paid out $286,000, as I recall, to create what Mr. Hoover said in 1912 was "a speculative fever."

All of these news stories that were sent out were of the character of news stories sent out during the consideration of the tariff bill.

Senators will recall that the sugar interests spent tens of thousands of dollars then to mislead the Congress and also to influence the public generally that the public in turn might influence the Congress. There were other large interests as disclosed by the investigation conducted by the lobby committee. Large amounts of money were used for propaganda purposes. It has been pointed out on the floor of the Senate time and time again how the power interests have used the newspapers as a vehicle to spread their propaganda, their poison, their misinformation, their misrepresentations, in order to mislead the public and to mislead the Congress. Identically the same methods are used by those who are operators and manipulators upon the New York Stock Exchange.

As I said, the unsuspecting average investor, without an opportunity to investigate the various corporations for himself, naturally relies on the financial authorities in New York, and he gets soaked. In 1929 the so-called "long" operators hoisted the prices of stocks and bonds upon the stock market until those stocks and bonds approached dizzy heights. All the time preceding that propaganda was being sent out all over the country by financial writers, by news organizations, through financial bulletins gotten out by various organizations in New York, until they had created what Mr. Hoover characterized as a "speculative fever."

In that interview I also stated, quoted the reporter:

Mr. BLAINE remarked also that the average American comes into the market only during bull movements. He is not a falling-market operator.

I said that generally the public comes into the market when the market is rising, when the "longs" are pushing the market until they have the market to that point where they have the opportunity to soak the unsuspecting public.

In that same interview I find this statement by the reporter:

"The uninformed investor," Senator BLAINE continued, "who lost so much in 1929 was the sort of person described by Mr. Hoover in the 1912 London Mining Journal as an 'idiot.'"

In that respect the reporter is mistaken as to what I said. I called his attention to the fact that if he would go to the United States Geological Survey library and there ask the attendant for the Mining Magazine of the issue of May, 1912, he would find an article written by Mr. Hoover wherein Mr. Hoover described the unsuspecting public as "idiots."

Therefore, at this time, Mr. President, I think, when the public is so vitally interested—interested not only in the rehabilitation of our economic conditions but also interested in what Congress is doing and especially interested in the proceedings before the Committee on Banking and Currency respecting the investigation of the New York Stock Exchange—it would, indeed, be informative, and perhaps instructive, to have in the RECORD the language Mr. Hoover expressed in 1912 when he was a citizen of Great Britain and a promoter in Great Britain, especially with reference to the promotion of mines in Australia and South America.

To be accurate and perfectly fair, any Senator who is interested may go to the United States Geological Survey library and there find volume 6, No. 5, of the Mining Magazine, May, 1912, edited by Mr. T. A. Rickard, pages 370 to 373, inclusive—the Mining Magazine published in London—containing an article entitled "Economics of a Boom," by Mr. H. C. Hoover. I assume that H. C. Hoover was Herbert C. Hoover. I may be mistaken in that respect. I understand, however, that that is correct.

Having addressed the editor, Mr. Hoover said:

SIR: I take pleasure in complying with your wish that I should give my views on the economics of mining booms.

I want to say to the Members of the Senate that if they want to read this article at the United States Geological Survey library it will be necessary for them to go to the library. There is a constant watchful eye upon that magazine and for good reasons.

If Senators will go to another part of the United States Geological Survey library, they will there find a vacant place on the shelf whence a magazine was taken and never returned and which magazine contained an article by Mr. Hoover. Therefore one can not borrow the magazine from the library. He must read it in the presence of some one, I assume for the purpose of assurance that the magazine will not be filched or purloined from the library.

I proceed with the reading of the statement of Mr. Hoover:

As the aftermath of every boom and slump in a particular department of the mining market, there is a flood of lamentation over the shrinkage in market-value and the enormous losses that have consequently ensued.

Senators will note that "There is a flood of lamentation over the shrinkages in market value and the enormous losses" quite analogous to the situations which have been developing in the last few years. There are lamentations, lamentations from men and women who have lost their entire life savings. During the boom period prior to 1929 they were led into the belief, through the propaganda of financial writers, that the greatest prosperity in the world was here and would continue, that stocks and bonds of the various industrial organizations and utilities would be of tremendous value and would be a security for them in the twilight of their lives.

Not only were they advised by the financial advisers and writers, but the information came out of the White House or out of the Cabinet to these men and women who were believing in the statements of public officials and financial advisers and those who were writing the propaganda. They invested their money. To-day many of those men and women are being supported by their friends, their relatives, their children, or by the public. Lamentations! Of course, Mr. President, there should be lamentations.

But let me examine into how Mr. Hoover treated those lamentations over shrinkages. I quote further:

Even the oft-repeated palliation that a minor amount of stock changes hands at top prices is quite superficial from an economic point of view.

In order to get at the true position it is necessary to disassociate clearly the various elements that are involved. The first of these elements is the actual industry in the given mining region upon which a boom has been built, and the second is the people at the financial center who are engaged in the provision of capital for this industry. The people must be divided into two classes, the insiders, who provide the capital, namely, the promoters, brokers, and so forth, and the outsiders, who may be styled the investing public.

It may be stated at once that the actual capital invested and risked in such a mining industry has nothing to do with either the nominal, issued, or market value of the shares of companies operating in a given region, but is what we may style the economic investment and consist of—

Then Mr. Hoover points out those three factors. I shall not read the first two factors. The third he designated as—

C. The amount of money expended in the raising of this capital. This sum is one difficult to estimate, for, from a social point of view the promoter, broker, etc., must be supported by the industry and the "economic" outlay upon them is only the amount of their takings from the investor or the industry that they do not reapply to reproductive investment. If they live modestly and continue to labor this wastage amounts to very little. If, on the other hand, they squander their takings, it is in such proportion more important. This sum bears little or no relation to the gains of paper-trading which may be done as between two parties at the financial center. The insiders may make millions of such paper and sell it to each other or to the outsiders, but this, except for the economic expenditure, is simply taking a block of national wealth from the book of one individual and placing it in that of another.

In other words, the outsiders may take millions of such paper, and Mr. Hoover states that that is merely transferring property from one individual and placing it in the hands of another. In other words, the insiders put their hands in the pockets of the American people during these raids and extract the money, the savings, if you please, of the men and women of this country, and put that money into their own pockets.

Mr. Hoover knew exactly what he was talking about, and he was then talking about a subject that is very familiar to us now, especially in view of the recent investigation by the Committee on Banking and Currency. Transferring the money from the pocket of one individual to that of another! That is exactly the method of the pickpocket. The criminal on the street who slips up behind one and puts his hand in one's pocket and extracts a pocketbook which he transfers to his own pocket is as respectable as are the insiders who have, through their propaganda, misrepresented facts to the public, put their hands into the public's pocket, to extract money and place the money so extracted into the pockets of the insiders by way of the stock exchange.

Mr. Hoover was an engineer at that time, and to make his position clear he said:

In order to make the matter clear we may take a hypothetical example. On the Blank mine the A expenditure—

I have discussed that. Mr. Hoover presented A, B, and C expenditures—

On the Blank mine the A expenditure—that is, the annual development and equipment and management on the ground—is, say £100,000—

Speaking the language of the country of his adoption—

The B expenditure on the registration of the company, directors' fees, secretary, etc., is £5,000. The C expenditure is extremely difficult to assess. It may comprise the living of one or several promoters over a longer or shorter period, and a part of the living of several brokers and jobbers and their satellites. To arrive at a figure, however, we may assess this at £15,000. We have, therefore, a total "economic" investment of £120,000. It is quite possible that the Blank mine may be capitalized at £1,000,000, and that the insiders may sell the shares to the outsiders at that figure.

One hundred and twenty thousand pounds are invested, but shares are issued to the extent of £1,000,000, and the insiders then sell those shares to the outsiders. That is when they begin to pluck the public; that is when the insiders begin to pick the pockets of the public. Now, let me continue the quotation—

We have therefore a total "economic" investment of £120,000. It is quite possible that the Blank mine may be capitalized at £1,000,000, and that the insiders may sell the shares to the outsiders at that figure, but the £880,000 representing the difference—if we assume that the mine should fail absolutely—is not in itself an economic loss. It simply means that this much of the national wealth was transferred from one individual to another.

Eight hundred and eighty thousand pounds, representing no value whatever, sold to the outsiders by the insiders, and Mr. Hoover says that means only that so much of the national wealth was transferred from one individual to another. But that £880,000 in shares cost the insiders not a single dollar. They transferred those shares to the outsiders. It cost the outsiders, the unsuspecting public, the ones who had their pockets picked, the amount for which each share was sold, and those shares were sold according to the degree of the speculative fever that was abroad in the land.

Continuing the quotation—

It might result in a decrease in national wealth if the £880,000, or any part of such purchase of the mine, were removed from this kingdom.

That is, if the insiders left Great Britain and took with them the amount of money which they had picked from the pockets of the Britishers, removed that money to some other realm, of course, then the kingdom, the British realm would have had that much national wealth extracted from it; but, first, the insiders took the money out of the pockets of the outsiders without any consideration whatever excepting the certificate of stock, which was no more than the result of the operation of a printing press and represented in value nothing more than the junk value of the paper upon which the certificate was printed.

It is quite possible to say that the insiders may spend more than £15,000 upon legitimate living or on riotous extravagance.

And that they may never again perform any labor; so that a portion of the £880,000 does not return for reinvestment in reproductive work; but, in any event, experience shows that it is a minor quantity. Further, from an economic point of view—

And I want the Senate to note this particular sentence from the pen and mind of Mr. Hoover—

Further, from an economic point of view, this £880,000 of capital in the hands of the insiders is often invested to more reproductive purpose than if it had remained in the hands of the idiots who parted with it.

If the President has any knowledge of the operations of the insiders in stock gambling, the committee ought to be furnished with some specialists who were trained under Mr. Hoover during some period of his life in America so that those specialists might aid the Committee on Banking and Currency to ascertain how many dollars have been taken by the insiders from the pockets of the innocent, unsuspecting public.

In parenthesis, to make my point clear, I want to call attention to transactions in the J. I. Case Co. stock. I make the statement only upon information, and it may be incorrect, but I have it upon very respectable authority that in 1930 and 1931, during those two years, the stock transactions in the J. I. Case Co. stock in number equaled, as I recall, ninety-four times the total number of shares issued by that corporation, and that the insiders, the stock brokers, received as profits on those transactions an amount in excess of the total assets of that great corporation. I merely use that by way of example. It may be an exaggerated example, but at least it serves the purpose of pointing out how the insiders go into the pockets of the public and take their daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly wages and earnings and savings and transfer them into the pockets of the insiders.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator suggests that an investigation be made as to the amount of money which has been taken out of the pockets of the outsiders by the insiders. I do not know that what I am about to relate amounts to the same thing, but I think it is well within the figures to state that there was a depreciation in security values on the stock exchange in October, 1929, of some $29,000,000,000. Afterwards stocks went up, but in 1930 there was again a depreciation of some $20,000,000,000. All together it has been estimated as high as $70,000,000,000, but at least there was a $49,000,000,000 depreciation in values on the stock exchange in 1929 and 1930. That is quite a considerable sum, when we consider that there are only about $50,000,000,000 of real money in all the world.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly, Mr. President; and I thank the Senator from Florida for pointing out those facts, and I think if an investigation were made it would be disclosed that these depreciations and losses were depreciations and losses largely of the outsiders. While those who are actual operators upon the stock exchanges may, as I said in the interview, lose among themselves, the great losses, the enormous losses, are incurred and the great injury is suffered by the unsuspecting, innocent public.

Mr. President, the philosophy of this time is a philosophy that leads only one way, and that is to a universal disregard for organized government. When men and women who have a right to rely upon banks, investment houses, and public officials are betrayed, when the Government furnishes them no protection, when the thief who takes their money goes scot free—not only scot free but becomes a respectable gentleman of our communities, and often the holder of high offices of public trust—that brings distrust of government. When tens and hundreds of thousands of men and women are brought to the door of the poorhouse, when for the balance of their lives they must face the dangers of starvation, anguish, and want, can we expect that there will be any high regard for government, or any respect for those who occupy the positions in government?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. These people used the mails in these transactions. They made statements that were not true, misrepresenting values. Does not the Senator think that the postal inspectors and the officials of the Department of Justice might render service by investigating violations of criminal statutes through using the mails to defraud?

Mr. BLAINE. My own opinion is that if full investigation were made, it would be found that these financial writers and these financial houses had attended to it that they were within the law.

I know of no postal regulation that prevents a newspaper reporter from sending out a false report over the country regarding either individuals, institutions, or property, even though he received large sums for doing so. I doubt whether there is any present law that would punish these men, who are in fact aiding as great thieves as is the pickpocket. Judged by the standard of good morals, of proper conduct among their fellow men, the stock jobber's acts are more heinous than the crime of the man who burglarizes a bank under the power and pressure of machine guns. The only difference is that they keep within the law. They retain their respectability, not because they are entitled to it but because they can make large donations; they can employ the ablest lawyers; they can buy the newspapers or the newspaper writers, some of them. They mold public opinion through devious means, and thus they influence public officials, and in the finality they make the laws.

Mr. Hoover pointed out some other very pertinent situations.

We have heard a great deal about psychology. It is rather an ancient word. At least, it goes back to May, 1912; and Mr. Hoover has not forgotten the language. Note, Senators, quoting from his article:

> There are many psychological factors in any boom; one at least is often put forward as of some consequence, and that is the value of a speculative fever.

Speculative fevers are produced by propaganda, paid for by the operators and brokers on the stock exchange. I will not go into the details of that. I hope the committee investigating this problem will go into all of the ramifications of the stock exchanges, ascertain the modes and methods by which the insiders rob the outsiders, how far the large banks of the commercial centers have their hands in the pockets of the outsiders, and ascertain what part the investment banker plays in this great game of robbery and theft, pilfering, and crime.

Why, Mr. President, the stock exchanges, with the practices that have already been disclosed before the committee, can be justly charged with having the leprosy of crime spotted all over them.

Now, let me continue. I want to repeat. Mr. Hoover says:

> There are many psychological factors in any boom; one at least is often put forward as of some consequence, and that is the value of a speculative fever. For instance, the Nigeria possesses mineral wealth worthy of development, and the securing of adequate capital is made easier by such a fever. It is true that all of those of experience realize the great difficulty in securing adequate capital for new industries where such a fever does not exist, and it is a fact that the C expenditure—> for promoters, brokers, etc., is greater without such a fever than with it.

To which I have called attention—

In other words, if a speculative fever can be created through the false representations made by financial writers and made in financial bulletins, those methods, as Mr. Hoover says, are not quite so expensive as the slower method to which he calls attention later on.

He says:

> For more intermediaries must be employed. In such cases 99 per cent of the capital raised comes from persons who buy shares—> not on any knowledge of the enterprise beyond its market nickname, but because of the fullness of hope that they may resell the shares to some other outsider on the following morning at a higher price.

Why, of course, Mr. President, the outsiders, the unsuspecting, innocent public know nothing about the daily sales or what may happen on the stock exchange during any day. That is left to the brokers, the insiders, the specialists, the investment bankers, the J. P. Morgans & Co.

Mr. Hoover says:

> Given that this person is capable of conviction as to the merits of a given enterprise, the cost of convincing him outside of boom hours is very great; it usually takes years instead of days, and an army of intermediaries instead of a troop.

So the operators and the brokers, the investment brokers, hire these high-powered, high-pressure financial writers. The country is propagandized. All sorts of representations are made. The public is told what great profits will come to them if they buy the shares of the X company or the A company or the B company. That is cleverly manipulated.

Perhaps on the first of the month a corporation has reorganized and split its shares, multiplied the original shares two, four, or more times, and those split shares are gradually fed into the market. The financial-news writers tell the story daily, varying the amount for which those shares sell on the stock market, five or six dollars a share, the next day five and a half, and another day at a fractional gain, and another day another fractional gain. Those news stories go out to all the papers in the country. One news service organization, as I recall, sent a story out to 250 newspapers in the United States. That campaign is kept up daily, most cleverly. The boom starts and the shares go up ten, fifteen, twenty dollars a share. That is when the insider, with his split shares, or other shares, for that matter, fleeces the public. That is when the "longs" are interested. That is the time when the "longs" are playing the market. That was the situation which prevailed in 1929 before the collapse came. Then the other side of the market, the "shorts," began their operations, and the unsuspecting innocent public, which had purchased millions upon millions of securities, found those securities going down, down, down, down. I recall some stocks which were selling at $50 a share; and when the manipulation took place, those shares continued going down, down, down, down. I remember one corporation in the radio field where the shares went to practically nothing, where the so-called specialists had the inside information respecting that corporation, where the so-called specialists knew that the president of the corporation was going to send out a letter on a certain day, for instance, suggesting a meeting of the board of directors, and in that same letter suggesting that the board of directors would determine upon the reorganization of the company. So those letters were sent out, the specialists knew those letters were sent out, the shares of that corporation continued to fall until all of the outsiders were frozen out, every single dollar taken away from them, and the company, with $325,000,000 of assets, sold for $11,000,000, in round numbers. Those outsiders were "sold down the river" by the insiders.

I think Mr. Hoover has, probably unsuspectingly and unintentionally, contributed literature on the stock market and its operations so valuable that that literature ought to be preserved. That article written by Mr. H. C. Hoover ought to be in the archives of this Government and available for the people of this country. I understand that there is but one copy now, and that is available only in the presence of the guardian eye of an individual down at the Geological Survey Library.

Therefore, Mr. President, in order to make this entire article available without Members of the Senate having to go to great inconvenience, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article, with the notations which appear on the article taken from the original article in the Mining Magazine, be made a part of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Mining Magazine, London, May, 1912]

ECONOMICS OF A BOOM

THE EDITOR.

SIR: I take pleasure in complying with your wish that I should state my views on the economics of mining booms.

As the aftermath of every boom and slump in a particular department of the mining market, there is a flood of lamentation over the shrinkages in market value and the enormous losses that have consequently ensued. Even the oft-repeated palliation that a minor amount of stock changes hands at top prices is quite superficial from an economic point of view.

In order to get at the true position it is necessary to disassociate clearly the various elements that are involved. The first of these elements is the actual industry in the given mining region upon which a boom has been built, and the second is the people at the financial center who are engaged in the provision of capital for this industry. These people must be divided into two classes: The insiders, who provide the capital, namely, the promoters, brokers, etc., and the outsiders, who may be styled the investing public, although they often enough consist of other promoters and brokers. These classes could perhaps be truly styled the producers and consumers of mining shares, or in more formal economic terms, the entrepreneur and capitalists.

It may be stated at once that the actual capital invested and risked in such a mining industry has nothing to do with either the nominal, issued, or market value of the shares of companies operating in a given region, but is what we may style the economic investment and consists of:

A. The actual working capital and materials shipped to this given mining region and there devoted to plant, machinery, development, management, etc.

B. The expenditure in the management of these companies at the financial center, such as directors, secretary, engineers, registration fees, office expenses, advertising, etc.

C. The amount of money expended in the raising of this capital. This sum is one difficult to estimate, for, from a social point of view, the promoter, broker, etc., must be supported by the industry and the "economic" outlay upon them is only the amount of their takings from the investor or the industry that they do not reapply to reproductive investment. If they live modestly and continue to labor, this wastage amounts to very little; if, on the other hand, they squander their takings, it is in such proportion more important. This sum bears little or no relation to the gains of paper trading, which may be done as between the two parties at the financial center. The insiders may make millions of such paper and sell it to each other or to the outsiders, but this, except for the economic expenditure, is simply taking a block of the national wealth from the pocket of one individual and placing it in that of another.

Further, the matter somewhat hangs on the question as to whether we look at it from a world's view or from the more narrow national view. In the latter case, if the promoter or vendor be a foreigner and remove his takings from the country, then these sums would constitute a part of the economic expenditure. This is not so, however, from the broader view of total world's wealth.

The economic investment then consists of the sums represented by 'A,' 'B,' and 'C,' and if the net returns from the metal produced in this given mining region show a profit on this economic investment, then the national wealth has been increased. By profit, I mean necessarily the return of this capital with interest.

In order to make the matter clear, we may take a hypothetical example. On the Blank mine the 'A' expenditure—that is, the actual development and equipment and management on the ground, is, say, £100,000. The 'B' expenditure on the registration of the company, directors' fees, secretary, etc., is £5,000. The 'C' expenditure is extremely difficult to assess. It may comprise the living of one or several promoters over a longer or shorter period, and a part of the living of several brokers and jobbers and their satellites. To arrive at a figure, however, we may assess this at £15,000. We have therefore a total "economic" investment of £120,000. It is quite possible that the Blank mine may be capitalized at £1,000,000 and that the insiders may sell the shares to the outsiders at that figure, but the £880,000 representing the difference—if we assume that the mines should fail absolutely—is not itself an economic loss. It simply means that this much of the national wealth was transferred from one individual to another. It might result in a decrease in national wealth if the £880,000, or any part of such purchase of the mine were removed from this kingdom. It is quite possible to say that the insiders may spend more than the £15,000 upon legitimate living or on riotous extravagance, and that they may never again perform any labor, so that a portion of the £880,000 does not return for reinvestment in reproductive work; but, in any event, experience shows that it is a minor quantity. Further, from an economic point of view, this £880,000 of capital in the hands of the insiders is often invested to more reproductive purpose than if it had remained in the hands of the idiots who parted with it.

We can assume many alternatives; for instance, that the insiders succeed in selling only £120,000 worth of these shares to the outsiders. The enterprise would show a shrinkage in market value of one million, but even the insiders would not have benefited by the transactions; or we can assume that the enterprise returns the £120,000 and an additional £100,000, in which case the national wealth has been increased, although there was a shrinkage of £780,000 in apparent value; we can also assume that the mine provision worth £15,000,000, or any other handsome amount, on this occasion.

The reasoning may be extended to the recent case of the Nigerian tin boom. At the maximum point of the market enthusiasm for this industry the total nominal capital of the companies involved in that region, so far as I have been able to determine from available material was, in round numbers, £5,200,000, of which there was issued about £4,400,000. The total of what may be called the market value; that is, the quotation multiplied by the number of shares of the companies involved was about £10,700,000; and the total working capital (omitting cash payments to vendors) provided for these companies was about £1,100,000. Such a bare financial statement, however, requires a large amount of readjustment. Many of the companies hold shares of other companies, and thus there is a good deal of duplication in such figures. Any proper adjustment is impracticable, as the holdings are not sufficiently known. I would not be surprised, however, if it were found that upwards of 30 per cent should be deducted from all the figures for this reason. If we assume that there is fairly assured a total output of 50,000 tons of black tin from properties now known, and that this metal can be recovered over a period of 10 years, there would be on known results a profit of roughly £2,500,000. Such a sum would have a present value, if discounted at 7 per cent, of about £1,875,000. It is, of course, possible and probable that more tin will be found than that mentioned.

Now, as to the "economic" expenditure on this industry we can be certain that the actual working capital available for administration and work at the mines does not exceed £1,100,000, and out of this comes not only the 'A' expenditure but a large part of 'B' as well; namely, directors' fees, etc., are paid out of the working capital; in some cases registration and promotion costs are met without intrenching upon this, but such an allowance can be neglected as the sum mentioned embraces the working capital the preliminary syndicates, and finance companies. In any event, it appears to me that this figure of £1,100,000 is a liberal estimate for the 'A' and 'B' portion of the "economic" investment as the industry is now constituted. It is not necessary to include in the "economic" investment the cost of railways and commercial establishments, because those concerns should have returned their capital from the working costs of tin production and from the development of the country in other directions. The 'C' expenditure it is, of course, impossible to assess. One can only say in a general way that the promoters of Nigerian tin mines are most of them active and energetic men who live in a modest manner and do not buy undue quantities of jewelry for their wives; moreover, but few of them possess more than one motor car and no steam yachts have yet been announced. Therefore we need not take the gloomy view that they will retire with the money they have received, becoming drones on the community, or establish families of drones, or squander it in riotous living. The more hopeful view is that they will reinvest their takings in reproductive work and continue to devote their experience and abilities to the augmentation of the national wealth. The actual sum of wastage, therefore, through this item is not likely to be large. Moreover, there are only about 32 companies having a working capital in excess of £15,000, so that these gentlemen can not be a very large body or of very large ideas. Between a rough valuation of £1,875,000 for the industry "in sight" and the £1,100,000 mentioned, we have a margin probably greater than the actual wastage involved on the 'C' account. For all of which reasons it seems probable that Nigerian tin will show a sound profit from a national point of view. And should the actual industry expand the favorable margin will be greater.

It must be borne in mind in considering any particular economic current that there are many side streams, the introduction of the details of which only confuses the main outlines. For instance, a considerable proportion of the expenditure under 'A' and 'B' will be saved by officers and employees from their wages and salaries, and a considerable portion of it will be expended on machinery and plant, and the manufacturers and workmen of this equipment will save a portion of this money, the whole of which savings may return to reproductive expenditure and should, from a point of view strictly of national wealth, be deducted from the "economic" expenditure. It might also be said that the money paid to the Government in stamps (which probably amounts to £50,000) is not entirely an economic loss, as such contribution to the general taxation entails a less heavy drain from other quarters. And, furthermore, some of the Government expenditure may be reproductive. There are many other items of this sort and I draw attention to them lest some wise person arise to state that I have not considered these hundreds of economic rivulets that feed the main stream.

There are many psychological factors in any boom, one at least is often put forward as of some consequence, and that is the economic value of a speculative fever. For instance, Nigeria possesses mineral wealth worthy of development, and the securing of adequate capital is made easier by such a fever. It is true that all of those of experience realize the great difficulty in securing adequate capital for new industries where such a fever does not exist, and it is a fact that the 'C' expenditure on promoters, brokers, etc., is greater without such a fever than with it, for more intermediaries must be employed. In such cases 99 per cent of the capital raised comes from persons who buy shares not on any knowledge of the enterprise beyond its market nickname, but because of the fullness of hope that they may resell the shares to some other outsider on the following morning at a higher price. Given that this person is capable of conviction as to the merits of a given enterprise, the cost of convincing him outside of boom hours is very great; it usually takes years instead of days, and an army of intermediaries instead of a troop. On the other hand, and of greater importance from an economic point of view, is the fact that in boom times a multitude of worthless ventures are started; these represent a great economic loss, which would not in other circumstances ever have arisen. Thus out of the £1,100,000 provided for Nigerian mines, probably more than half is for companies destined before their birth to early and complete extinction. This wastage amounts to several times the amounts saved in more economical finance as set out in the first part of this paragraph.

If we wish to extend the application of these principles to the various mining booms that the London market has experienced, we could say with some assurance that the Witwatersrand and Broken Hill have been most highly profitable mining districts, and that the national wealth was greatly increased thereby. We could also say that from anything now known West Australia, West Africa, and Rhodesia will probably result in economic loss. We could also say that from the point of view of the English investor alone, Russia, Spain, and Mexico probably show a profit, but that the United States, Canada, Queensland, South Australia and Victoria, and South America generally, show a loss. Obviously, it does not follow that individual enterprises in those unprofitable districts may not have been abundantly successful and in every way justifiable.

H. C. HOOVER.

LONDON, May 7.

[In regard to the sequelæ of a boom we can state that Mr. Hoover is slightly in error, as the motor car and yacht stage of prosperity has just been reached by one or two of the Nigerian operators.—EDITOR.]

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 91, line 4, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Under the subhead "Coast and Geodetic Survey," on page 91, line 4, after the name "United States," the committee proposes to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to read:

Field expenses, Atlantic coast: For surveys and necessary resurveys of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, including the coasts of outlying islands under the jurisdiction of the United States, $150,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show and I want the few Senators who are present to know exactly what has been done with this bill so far as the Department of Commerce and its Foreign Service are concerned. I have asked that the figures be furnished me by those who are familiar with them, and I am going to recite them now, very, very briefly, of course.

It is the desire of those of us who are familiar with the Department of Commerce to reinsert in this bill a sum aggregating about $465,000, so that the work of the department may not be so seriously interfered with and so outrageously injured as it would be if what has been done by the Senate shall be enacted into law.

In order to accomplish the purpose it would be necessary to ask unanimous consent that we reconsider the items which have been passed upon by the Senate, and then present the appropriate items seriatim in regard to the activities of the Department of Commerce.

I spoke to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and he does not feel that he could agree that he could accord unanimous consent to that effect, and he feels that he is bound by what the Senate has done in regard to these appropriations. Because that is the attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, I want to make plain exactly what has been done by the House bill, in the first instance, then subsequently by the Senate bill, in the second instance.

The proposed amendment I have suggested, or concerning which I have spoken, would restore, I repeat, $465,000 to the appropriation for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, making the net cut somewhat over 10 per cent under the House bill instead of 19.87 per cent, as recommended by the Senate committee.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has a present appropriation of $5,334,122. The House bill gives that bureau for the next fiscal year $4,869,531, representing a cut of $464,591, or about 9 per cent.

The Senate committee recommended a further cut of $964,531, which is practically 20 per cent under the House figures. The committee was instructed by the Senate to make cuts of 10 per cent in the appropriations carried in the bill, but in the case of this particular bureau twice that amount was deducted from its appropriations.

If $465,000 were restored the bureau, it would still have its appropriations reduced about $1,000,000 under the present funds, a cut of 18 per cent.

The bill which is before the Senate, House bill 9349, if enacted, will result in just this:

Foreign offices which must be closed, 20 in number.

District offices which must be closed, 18 in number, and these 18 district offices are located in the following cities: Buffalo, Charleston, Charlotte, Dallas, Des Moines, El Paso, Mobile, Memphis, Pittsburgh, Galveston, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Louisville, Milwaukee, Wilmington, Norfolk, and Salt Lake City.

The foreign offices which will be required to be closed under the bill are at Barcelona, Bucharest, Lisbon, Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Prague, Helsingfors, Milan, Riga, Warsaw, Berne, Oslo, Bombay, Hong Kong, Melbourne, Mukden, Sao Paulo, Panama City, and San Juan.

The divisions which will be abolished by the bill are five in number. The employees who must be dismissed if this bill becomes a law as now it is contemplated by the Senate, will be—

In the city of Washington, 252.

In the United States outside of Washington, 153.

In the foreign service, 88.

The total number required to be dismissed from the service of the department will be 473.

There will be an elimination of monthly detailed statistics on competitive foreign markets. The domestic commerce survey work will be eliminated, as well as the activities relating to the regional distribution, commodity movement, credit and business failures, consumer demand, industrial marketing, special trade studies for grocers, jewelers, electrical industry, credit men, garment manufacturers, hardware, lumber, naval stores, and so forth.

This is what this bill does to the Department of Commerce.

If Senators want to do it, well and good. But if the elimination of these activities is accomplished by merely a yardstick of percentage of reduction, it is a wrong which can not be justified. If we proceed with a reduction of any department of government upon the basis that that department is unnecessary, and there is a fair defense of that position, none at this time can complain. All favor economy, all favor reductions which may be legitimately, scientifically, or logically made. But I submit, sir, in view of these figures, that that sort of thing has neither been attempted here, nor has it been accomplished. On the other hand, we have just slashed without regard to the effect which may be had.

In order that the RECORD may show the facts in regard to the matter, I ask leave, on page 70, lines 19 and 20, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$1,650,000" and to insert "$1,990,000."

I ask that the various amendments may be pursued. If consent can not be granted, I submit, of course, to the determination of the chairman of the committee and of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in view of the unanimous consent which has been given for the consideration of this bill, I do not see how I could accede to that request now.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is up to the Senator, of course. I recognize that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. I can not grant the request of the Senator under the circumstances. The Senator knows my position. My position is a great deal the same as his. But he knows what the orders of the Senate are, and we are obeying the orders of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the orders of the Senate were to make a 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. JONES. In the aggregate.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have in these items substantially a 30 per cent reduction. That is exactly the mathematical computation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says at one time that it is not a scientific reduction because we have not exercised any care in saying where the places are to make the reductions, and then the Senator complains because we have taken more from one item than another. What the committee has done has been to reduce the aggregate 10 per cent, and we made the reductions after a most careful investigation of each item which has been passed upon.

Mr. JOHNSON. The care that was exercised by the committee may be manifest to the Senator from Tennessee. The care is not manifest in the items which have been slashed and in the items to which I have adverted and which I have read. I venture the assertion that there was practically no member of the committee who understood that he was eliminating the various offices in the various sections of the United States at the time that elimination was made.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Entirely mistaken. If I recollect right, the head of the department notified his constituents, he certainly notified mine, that certain offices were going to be abolished. I understood from my constituents that this Cabinet officer urged my constituents to protest against my action in seeking to reduce them. In other words, Cabinet officers have sent out propaganda to the constituents of Senators on that question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know nothing about Cabinet officers sending out propaganda; but I do know, sir, that were I a Cabinet officer and I saw the service of the United States injured, crippled, halted, ruined, I would do everything within my power, and I would conceive it to be my duty to do it, to prevent that injury, that halting, that ruin. So I do not think any man who is in the service of the United States, no matter who he is, is open to criticism in the slightest degree because he protested either to constituents or to Senators against the crippling of his particular department.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. If there had been a threat that there would be an office abolished or if the head of a department said that he would be compelled to abolish an office, and that office happened to be in the Senator's State, would he not reserve the right to make some investigation and find out whether the Secretary of Commerce was correct about it and whether it ought to be abolished if the cut was made?

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly would want to ascertain the facts.

Mr. LOGAN. In my State, in the city of Louisville, the board of trade and other business people were induced to pass resolutions protesting against the reduction of the appropriation for the Department of Commerce because it would result in closing the office there, to which the Senator just referred. I found the fact to be that $13,500 is appropriated for the expense of that office and that it has five clerks and stenographers. I also found that the work can be done just as efficiently and probably better with three than five. Therefore a 40 per cent or even 30 per cent reduction is no cause for the closing of that office.

For that reason I disagree with the Secretary of Commerce that it is necessary to close the office although he has the power to do so. The reduction in the appropriation will still leave that office with sufficient funds to function properly although the expenses of that office may be reduced as much as the total of the appropriation is reduced.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator from Kentucky is correct about that, but that is not the idea of the heads of the department. What they want is no reduction in the appropriations. They are trying to make it appear, by propaganda sent to the various States wherever any such situation as that stated by the Senator from Kentucky arises, that that particular office is being destroyed or that it has got to be destroyed simply because of a comparatively small reduction made in the appropriation. I have been told over the telephone, though I have not seen the paper, that Secretary Mills came before a committee last Friday and made the suggestion that certain offices of collectors of customs in various States would have to be abolished. He said if the committee wanted to save, they could save $500,000 by cutting off a number of offices of collectors that were comparatively useless in various States. One of those offices happens to be in Memphis, Tenn. A man called me up the next morning and said that it was reported in the papers that I had introduced a bill to discontinue the office in Memphis, Tenn.

I merely state that for the purpose of showing to what extent the propaganda is being used to prevent any reductions in appropriations. If we listen to propaganda, our appropriations will be increased instead of reduced.

Mr. JOHNSON. I take it that the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Tennessee, like myself, are impervious to propaganda.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not suppose anyone is impervious to propaganda. If it is gotten out, we dislike very much totally to disregard it. I think Cabinet officers are doing a very great injustice when they indulge in propaganda that has no solid foundation of fact, as much of this propaganda has not. I think we ought not to listen to it, but we are obliged to pay some attention to what takes place, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am surprised at the admission of the Senator from Tennessee. There are upon the desks of every Senator, I assume, for I presume I am not alone in that particular, telegrams which it is utterly impossible for us to read concerning items in the tax bill. We are not going to determine our course by virtue of those telegrams nor because somebody says we are doing this, that, or the other thing. In reducing appropriations the question should be whether it is a just cut. If Senators believe it to be a just cut, I have no complaint in the slightest degree because they so believe.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I take it the Senator has not. I take it the Senator from Kentucky has not. Unfortunately, I am compelled to disagree with both of my colleagues in that regard.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield further to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Referring to a part of the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, I merely want to say that letters and telegrams which I have had from Louisville have contained the statement that the Senate has pending before it a bill providing for the abolishment of the office in the city of Louisville. That was not true, and I told them it was not true, but those people had been led to believe by some one—I know not by whom—to believe that we in the Senate are writing a provision into the bill that the office in Louisville shall be abolished and that I am going to vote for the bill. To that sort of propaganda I do object.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, that sort of thing is not accurate at all, yet the fact remains that that is exactly what we are doing and the consequences of our acts are that we will abolish these various offices. That I wanted to call to the attention of the Senate, and I wanted to make clear so far as I am personally concerned, a reduction which would be accorded something near 20 per cent by the insertion of the $465,000 to which I have referred would be a reduction which ought to be commensurate with the designs of the Senate as expressed in its resolution and which ought to satisfy the most economical in this body.

There is no desire, I take it, in anyone's mind to cripple the public service. All of us would maintain it. There may be different views as to what the public service will be benefited by. The Senator from Tennessee may think the abolition of the entire Commerce Department or all of its activities abroad would be an excellent thing. I do not think so. I might think that the abolishing of a very large part of the Farm Board would be an excellent thing. He might not think so; and so it runs.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that I think the Farm Board ought to be abolished. I do not think it has done the farmers any good. I think it would be a very wise thing to abolish it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not observe any bill before us for the abolishment of the Farm Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where is it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has introduced such a bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not aware of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I find that I am mistaken about it. The Senator from Nebraska just tells me that I am mistaken about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. We all make mistakes, and I would rather err upon the side of a decent, efficient public service than on the side of a crippled and injured public service.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator comes from a territory that gets its foreign trade largely the same as the territory from which I come. Is the Senator familiar with any distinct service that the Department of Commerce has rendered in South and Central America except to stir up revolutions and maintain dictatorships?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes. I will have to take issue with the Senator there. Yes; in the matter of trade they have done a very great service there and a great service in the Orient.

Mr. LONG. Perhaps I do not know, and probably I do not; but, for example, does the Senator know of one particular service they have ever done? I do not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have had them repeated to me continuously, but I would not attempt to relate them in detail.

Mr. LONG. None with fruits and none with coffee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think they have been very active in the matter of the fruit business.

Mr. LONG. The only thing the Senator will find—and I do not intend to take up the Senator's time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. LONG. The only thing I know of that the Department of Commerce was instrumental in doing was in the famous coffee treaty between the Bank of England and some French institution and bankers in Wall Street, whereby they limited the coffee output. Outside of that, I know of no service ever rendered by the Department of Commerce in Central and South America.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator and I will not disagree about the activities of Wall Street or the celebrated house of Morgan, so far as that goes; but that is apart from this question. Many of our merchants that I know of in the city of Los Angeles and in the city of San Francisco appreciate quite beyond words the foreign service which has been rendered by the Commerce Department; and I say that advisedly. The service which the department has rendered to the merchants and exporters and importers in California has been incalculable.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to confirm what the Senator from California has said. The testimony of merchants and manufacturers in my State is to the effect that this department has been very useful. I am not speaking about Wall Street. I do not know how they could help Wall Street.

The manufacturing companies, however, are very much concerned over the possibility of abolishing these offices. Last year I made an appeal for an office in western New York, and it was established there. Now the merchants and manufacturers of that section are very much distressed over the prospect that that activity will not be continued. So I share the apprehension of the Senator from California that we are doing a wrong thing. In this time of economic depression we ought to be doing things to stimulate business; we ought to be trying to build up trade instead of seeking to tear it down.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I did not mean in this instance to make an attack on Wall Street's activities. If the work of this bureau has done Wall Street any good, that is all right; but I meant to say that Wall Street will tell those who are gullible that the service has been of immense benefit. I happen, however, to have been more or less directly associated with foreign trade between this country and South and Central America, having fought many of the rate cases, and I know of no single distinct act of service that has ever been performed by the Department of Commerce. The Senator from Tennessee has referred to the fact that there was some agitation and some propaganda—and it reached my section—to induce people to petition their Senators not to vote for this curtailment. On the contrary, we had rather the service discontinue it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, that is a perfectly logical position, with which I do not quarrel at all, but what I complain about is that some would cripple a service that at least they admit has value and do not go to their full logical extent respecting it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will this proposed action interfere with the service at Los Angeles or San Francisco, in the Senator's State?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am so informed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know that the Senator had read the name of a city in his State where the service would be abolished.

Mr. JOHNSON. I read the name of Los Angeles.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is certainly not intended to abolish the service there; and I want to say to the Senator that if these reductions shall be made, there is not a particle of necessity to abolish any of these offices. The department can merely lessen the number of employees at those offices and the same work can go on and, in my judgment, will go on better. I share the view of the Senator in that I think we ought to help our foreign trade wherever we can. I think Doctor Klein is a very excellent head of that bureau; I have known him for a long time, and he is a very vigorous and active man; but he could get along, if this reduction should be made, just as well, if he will undertake to do it, in this time of depression, when all of us ought to get along on less, as he could with a larger appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. Mr. President, I admire the mode in which my friend from Tennessee can determine all of the intricacies and all of the technical and scientific aspects of the Foreign Trade Service and of the bill relating to the Department of Commerce. I have no such omniscience; I do not claim it. I speak only from information that has been accorded me that I accept at its face value. I have presented it to the Senate for its determination. Objection was made to one item. In order that the record may be clear in that regard, I now ask that we may return to pages 63 to 70, so that amendments may be presented which would in this bill reinsert about $465,000 which has been stricken out, thus making the reduction in this particular bureau about 20 per cent instead of the very large percentage that now exists.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let us go on and finish the bill and then decide the question of going back. I object to going back at the present time at any rate.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I understand the Senator from Tennessee, he also would object?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a moment. I sympathize very much with the contention of the Senator from California, but the Senate has spoken two or three different times with reference to action along these lines. I am not referring to anything that has been said, but I received this morning a communication telling me that if this bill should be passed as it is, one of these offices will be discontinued in one of the leading cities in my State. I take that as a sort of threat, a sort of intimidation upon the part of some one in the department. There is a law against action of that kind; there is a law against department officials even coming to Members of the Senate or the House of Representatives except in a particular kind of way. I do not know whether the department officials have been stirring up such communications as the one I received this morning or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think they have.

Mr. JONES. But it looks very much that way.

Mr. JOHNSON. What city was it where the Senator was notified the office would have to be closed?

Mr. JONES. It was not mentioned in the list the Senator from California read.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the Senator probably has some misinformation.

Mr. JONES. I do not know, but the information came pretty straight to me, to the effect that if this appropriation bill were not changed or some provision made for the office in the locality referred to, it would be abolished.

Mr. President, I think there is much force in the suggestion that there really is not any need for the discontinuance of any of these offices, even with the appropriations reduced as we propose to reduce them in this bill. There may result a decrease in the number of the force employed, so that instead of having three or four to take care of an office, they will probably have to handle it with one or two; but I am inclined to think that they will be able to take care of these offices if they are disposed to do so. I know the Senator from California wants them to operate just as economically as I do, so far as that is concerned; but I have had something to do with the Department of Commerce for quite a good many years. I know they are very active; I know they were extremely active when times were good, and, of course, we responded to their activities. Now I am afraid they will have to cut down some of those activities and reduce their force. The reduction in the appropriation may not cause the discontinuance of any office, but the department may not be able to employ so many people as it has heretofore employed. I myself regret that that has to be done; I regret that anybody has to be dismissed from the employment of the Government.

As I have said, I am not personally in active accord with the policy which we have pursued; but the Senate has directed the committee to take action along the lines which have been taken. This bill itself was reported to the Senate without these amendments, but the Senate sent it back to the committee and instructed the committee to cut it 10 per cent below the appropriations carried by the bill as it passed the House. The Senate did not tell the committee to take off 10 per cent here and 10 per cent there and 10 per cent yonder, but it expressly said "in the aggregate," recognizing that there would be more reductions in some items than in others. It provided, however, that in the aggregate the reductions should be 10 per cent. The committee has tried to follow the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that I agree largely with what the chairman of the committee has stated. I regret that anyone may not be employed as usual. I do not believe, however, that there will be any offices abolished. I do not know whether I am right or not—I sometimes think I am not—but I think it is still the privilege of Congress—and the Constitution says it is the duty of Congress—to direct the Cabinet officers as to what shall be done and what shall not be done. I take it that these offices will not be abolished unless the Congress abolishes them. They were created by act of Congress, and I imagine that the Congress still has control over them. We may be wrong; it may be in the power of a Cabinet officer, as many of them assert it to be in their power, to cut off at will when there is a reduction in an appropriation. For instance, the other day a Cabinet officer came before the subcommittee of which I am a member and said: "If this bill passes, it will mean the cutting off 36,000 men in the department." Such a statement as that is ridiculous. I can not imagine how it would be possible for a Cabinet officer to make such a statement, and yet he made it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am not aware of what the Cabinet officer said or to what the Senator refers.

Mr. McKELLAR. The statement was made before the subcommittee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was it made in relation to the Commerce Department?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I am speaking of the Commerce Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as the Commerce Department is concerned, I have a letter at my office, which I will put in the RECORD to-morrow, from the head of that department written to one of my constituents protesting against any cut, and asking him to write to his Senators requesting that there be no reduction in the appropriation for his department. That came from Mr. Lamont. I have the letter, not with me, but it is in my office, and I will bring it over to-morrow and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not question that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not done it heretofore because I had hoped it would not be necessary to do it. I was sorry that that letter was written; it ought not to have been written. Senators have enough trouble as it is in endeavoring to cut down expenditures, without our employees writing letters to our constituents urging them to protest against cuts in appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I know nothing about the letters that may have been written by one person or another. How many telegrams have we received from veterans during the last week, do you imagine, Mr. President? How many thousands telegraphic messages have come to us from veterans' organizations regarding the tax bill and regarding various provisions of the so-called economy bill that is now before the House? I do not in the slightest degree resent those messages being sent. It is impossible for me to read all the telegrams, it is true; but when it comes to administering a very great concern such as the Department of Commerce, I feel that I would scarcely be justified in standing here before the Senate and saying that I know that men will not be discharged, and I know that so much money as has been estimated for is not required for the various offices under that department.

There is one thing more and only one that I want to say about the discharge of employees. In the matter of the discharge of employees there is an economic problem presented to this Government; but there is another problem, too; there is the problem that all of us have been up against in our lives and that men and women in this community are up against to-day. I know people, and you do, sir, decent, God-fearing, Christian people, the best citizenship that we have in the Nation, who have their homes partly paid for, their children in school, who, sir, depend upon the meager salaries they receive from the Government, and these people, constituting the great human problem, are the ones who are affected by our action in providing insufficient appropriations that will require their discharge.

Mr. President, while I am here, I never will consent, if there be the reasonable probability of the necessity of the service of these people, to the reduction of an appropriation which will send them out on the streets with their homes half paid for, their children taken from schools, and their whole lives blighted because we have set up a fetish of economy at whose feet we are worshiping, and for which we are acting without rhyme and without reason; and I yield to no man on the face of the earth in desire for economy in government and for doing everything that may be essential to be done in order that we may have a due economy in the Government of this land.

These questions present themselves to me perhaps with a greater degree of force than to some of my fellows, and perhaps I am unduly alarmed about just human beings. But human beings, in the last analysis, are to be considered in these cuts and these discharges; and they are the ones, sir, finally, who are going to pay the price of the economy we practice, unless the economy be absolutely necessary.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations and have been for a good many years. I have never known that committee to work harder or to appear more conscious of its responsibilities than it has this year.

I have voted for these 10 per cent reductions. I am not going to vote for another one.

Mr. LONG. Neither am I.

Mr. COPELAND. This is not the way to make a Budget. I think, of course, that the Appropriations Committee and every Member of the Senate, whether he is a member of that committee or not, must do everything possible to economize; but there are limits beyond which we should not go.

The banks of America are boasting that they are 85 per cent liquid. That is just exactly as sane a boast as for a hospital to say that it has 85 per cent of its beds empty when there are thousands applying for admission. A hospital is instituted to take care of the sick. It is dedicated to that purpose, and is a dead thing when it ceases to function. Banks are organized to loan money to carry on the activities of the country. They are useless when they fail in that duty. The Senate in perfecting the appropriation bills must not forget the purpose of appropriations. They are to make governments function. No matter how poor we are, certain Government activities must not be ended.

For my part, I do not intend to be a party any longer to this method of reorganization of the departments in the arbitrary way in which we are doing it. I do not intend to vote again to proceed in that manner.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Has not the Senator from New York voted against every one of these motions to rerefer the appropriation bills to the committee to make these cuts?

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that I have voted in favor of each of them.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he voted against them.

Mr. COPELAND. I voted in favor of them. I held my nose while I did it. I said, when we did it the first time, that we put the cart before the horse; that we ought first to try, through the committee and then on the floor of the Senate, to make these reductions. But I have decided for myself—I do not criticize any other man upon the committee; he may do as he wishes—I have decided for myself that this is not the way to make a Budget.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] says that these activities are going to be carried on just exactly as they were before. That is perfectly absurd.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. It is perfectly absurd to say that if we wipe out all of the personnel and all of the appropriations heretofore used to operate these necessary institutions, they will operate automatically. That is absurd. Of course, they can not. The departments of Government are not automatic in their operations.

We have had the various department heads before the committee. We have heard their pleas, but what could we do about the matter? Our hands have been tied. There was nothing we could do except, under the order of the Senate, to make this arbitrary cut of 10 per cent.

Here is this department. I was not on the floor when the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] spoke, but I assume that in the early part of his remarks he brought to the attention of the Senate certain figures. I judge from the criticisms that have been passed since that those figures must have originated in the office of the Secretary of Commerce. I do not care where they came from. I am an American citizen, representing a sovereign State, the chief manufacturing State of this country. I want to know how our producers may be benefited. Our manufacturers want to sell their goods. I contend that it is the duty of government in the future, as it has been in the past, to operate these advertising agencies, these offices in various parts of the world, where the peoples of those countries may be told what we are manufacturing in the State of New York and other States of this Union. We desire to learn what other and competing countries are doing. But because the demand for economy is so great, the minute that cry is raised here we dare not vote otherwise than apparently to indorse the demand for economy. We have lost our sense of proportion. I fear we neglect to differentiate between true and false economy.

Mr. President, we must exercise economy. I concede that at once. The Budget must be balanced; but we can not balance the Budget wisely and sanely if we proceed along the lines we have followed the last three or four weeks. If we expect to exercise economies sufficient to make it possible to balance the Budget, we are going to destroy the operations of the Government.

I have had pending here for the last 10 days a resolution to the effect that it is the sense of the Senate that those items which have to do with capital investment, permanent improvements, amounting to between three and four hundred million dollars in this Budget, should be taken from the appropriation bills and otherwise financed. In the case of improvements which will be used for the next 50 or 100 years, why should we pay for those investments this year out of the income derived from taxation? If, however, we are to do that, we shall have to go ahead with this cruel, thoughtless, uneconomic, heartless, and absurd performance, and cut out of the various appropriation bills items which are absolutely essential to the proper conduct of government.

The particular thing which is before us is a matter of great concern to my State, and I have observed that it is of interest to every other State. I notice, according to this information which I have from the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], that the office in Louisville is going to be closed; the office in Memphis is going to be closed. I am sorry, but I have a direct interest in whether or not the office in Buffalo is to be closed. Buffalo is the center of the great chemical industry of this country, seeking to find sales for its products in every country of the world, in the face of bitter competition and the intelligent competition of Germany. The German people have long been the manufacturers of chemicals, chemical products, and dyestuffs. We are seeking in our country to build up those industries, and we want to find markets for them. To this end we need the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Are we going to wipe it out in order that we may "balance the Budget"? Or are we going to find some other way to balance the Budget and yet go on with our activities?

If we are to continue as we have started, when we get through the Senate of the United States will be in the unenviable position of being exactly like a banker who claims that his bank is 85 per cent liquid. We can say we have balanced the Budget, but we will have balanced the Budget at the expense of the prosperity and development of our country. We will have turned into the streets, as the Senator from California has said, thousands of respectable, hard-working, intelligent, able employees of the Government, employees who are helping the producers of America to dispose of their goods.

I do not know how other Senators feel about the matter; but when I go to New York and see in front of every employment agency on Sixth Avenue a queue of men a block long and in front of every soup kitchen in New York a line of hungry people I know that something must be done to keep in employment those who are there now and as speedily as possible to put back in employment millions of men and women who are now out of work.

I should like to ask Senators, Why are we so conceited as to think that the social and political structure of our country is so secure that nothing can destroy it? I should hate to voice in this public place the fears that I have as to what may happen. Hungry men are not going to stop because of the restrictions of law imposed by orderly government. I do not want to enlarge upon that. I have said enough to throw out the hint and the suggestion; but, Mr. President, we can not afford to disregard the menace of the situation.

I do not want to pose as an alarmist; but I want every person within the sound of my voice to know that in my heart is a real fear as to what may come to America in the next 12 months or the next 6 months.

There are things here more important than a presidential election. There are matters pending here more significant than the choice of a candidate for President by either party. There are perils confronting our country which can not be disregarded by thoughtful citizens.

In formulating our appropriation bills this year it is our business to take into consideration the evil effects as well as the good effects of the economies that are to be brought about through these measures. It is our business to see that those economies are not carried so far as actually to break down government and to bring the deluge. That is the way I feel about the matter; and so I say, so far as I am concerned, I am not going to vote any more for arbitrary cuts, because in my opinion those cuts are being applied in a way that menaces the Government and its perpetuity.

I have spoken strongly and feelingly, but I have spoken from the heart. I am disturbed about this matter. I am distressed beyond words by what I think I see. If other Senators see the same thing, I know that every precaution will be taken to preserve our institutions. We will not spend our time in exchanging bitter words. We will not get into disputes which are unworthy of us. We will face the facts as they are, and try to solve this problem in such a way that our country may be preserved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is remarkable how much we can get disturbed over a comparatively small matter.

In 1929 the Department of Commerce was just as vigorous as it is to-day. It probably had just as many offices. It probably did just as much work. The year 1929, up until October, was one of the most prosperous years we had.

Do Senators know how much we expended that year? I wish the Senator from New York would listen to this. In 1929, with all the prosperity we had up until October of that year, every bureau of that department ran at full tilt. We spent $3,711,957, and we are going to spend over $200,000 more this year, if this cut goes through, than we spent in 1929.

In 1930, it is true, the department got a larger appropriation. The appropriation was increased in 1929 to $4,257,357. In 1930 it ran up to $4,539,923, and in 1931 it ran up to $5,086,660. In 1932 the appropriation was $5,334,122.

Last year an enormous amount was appropriated, more than ought to have been appropriated, of course, and even the President sent in a recommendation for but $4,195,000. The committee, with the 10 per cent reduction, asked that only $190,000 be cut off of that, and yet there are all these protests.

The Senator from New York says there is an arbitrary cut of 10 per cent. There is no such thing as that. We passed upon every item of the bill. We cut some in smaller measure, some in larger measure. We cut off those which ought to have been cut off and we added to those which should have been added to, and some were left as they were. So the committee has made no arbitrary cut; it has made a careful cut, looking into all the facts and simply cutting the aggregate 10 per cent.

The Senator from New York says our hands are tied. Our hands are not tied. The Senate, by a majority of 50 to 29, directed that this be done. Does the Senator from New York mean to say that after the Senate votes, and especially by such a large majority, it ties the hands of those who are outvoted? I do not see that at all.

Then, to quote his exact words, he says that we are "destroying the functions of the Government" in deducting this item. It destroys the functions of the Government? An appropriation of $4,100,000 is recommended. The committee recommends $3,905,000, and because there is a cut of less than $200,000 the Senator from New York inveighs against it and says we are destroying the functions of this particular bureau because we cut the appropriation from $4,195,000 to $3,905,000.

The department itself, spreading the propaganda, undertakes to show that offices will be abolished throughout the country, endeavoring to frighten the Senate into restoring these improper, extravagant, wasteful appropriations.

I do not believe the Senate will do it. The Senator from New York went so far as to say a few moments ago—and I quote his words—"It would destroy the Department of Commerce if we balance the Budget in this way." Is it possible that because one bureau in the Department of Commerce is reduced from $4,195,000 to $3,905,000 it is going to destroy the whole Department of Commerce? That is a logic I can not understand. That is not the logic of the situation. We will cut down the expenditures, we will cut off extravagances, we will reduce the amount the Government gives, but we will get better service.

Let us look at the practical workings of it. Was the bureau destroyed in 1929? It functioned that year as never before. Yet we appropriated less for it that year than we are proposing to appropriate by this bill. Why should the Department of Commerce, which flourished in 1929 with a lower appropriation than we propose to give it this time, be going to the "demnition bowwows"?

If that is the kind of a department it is, we ought not to appropriate as much as we propose to appropriate by this bill. I say that in my judgment the committee, even with a 10 per cent cut, has given to this bureau more than it ought to have, and I believe that we will get better work with a smaller amount of money than we did last year.

Has it improved our business? In 1929, recollect, we gave them $3,711,000. Has our business improved since that time year by year? It has gone backward. They have had increased appropriations, and do we get better service? Not at all. The returns have been less and less each year since 1929, and we all know it. Yet, because it is proposed to cut off $290,000 from what the President recommended, they say we are going to destroy this department.

I deny that, and ask for a vote, in which I hope the committee will be sustained. The bill went back to the committee by a vote of 50 to 29, and I hope there will not be any reversal of that vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 91, line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I would like to direct a question to the Senator from Tennessee in reference to the increase of the appropriation for the Department of Commerce. I wondered whether the Senator had taken into consideration the requirements of the census, for which we have made a large appropriation for three years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; all those things were taken into consideration.

Mr. FESS. That would account for the large appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would account for some of it, and that is an additional reason why the appropriation this year should not be as great as it has been heretofore.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the pending bill and have it printed in the RECORD. The amendment is to be inserted on page 30, and is not to increase the appropriation. It is an amendment simply for the purpose of making available at the end of this fiscal year an unexpended balance of $3,200 in connection with the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing, the National Parliament of Iceland. I ask permission that this amendment be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. NORBECK's amendment was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 30, after line 8, insert the following:

"One thousandth anniversary of the National Parliament of Iceland.

"The unexpended balance of $3,173.75 of the appropriation of $55,000 contained in the joint resolution approved January 20, 1930 (46 Stat. 57), for the expenses of participation by the United States in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing, the National Parliament of Iceland, is continued available until June 30, 1933, for the same purposes, and for the transportation and subsistence or per diem in lieu thereof (notwithstanding the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto) of a representative or representatives of the Government of the United States to make the formal presentation of the statue of Leif Ericsson, including such expenses of entertainment as the Secretary of State shall deem proper."

Mr. REED submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the pending bill, which was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 131, after line 22, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"Section 6. Not to exceed 12 per centum of any of the foregoing appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor may be transferred, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to any other appropriation or appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 under the same department, but no appropriation shall be increased more than 15 per centum by such transfers: Provided, That a statement of all transfers of appropriations made hereunder shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1935."

PROPOSED MERGER OF ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP LINES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate just a moment, several days ago before the Committee on Appropriations there occurred this colloquy:

Senator McKELLAR. Brought down to its real meaning, it means, the meaning of that agreement is that you are not permitted to transfer these British ships without the consent of the British Government.

Mr. KEATING. That is it.

I now find from an article in the New York Times of April 11 that the International Mercantile Marine has made an agreement with the White Star Line by which ships of the International Mercantile Marine and the White Star Line are to be consolidated on the Atlantic run, and this particular company, the International Mercantile Marine, under its purchases from the United States Lines, is now drawing subsidies in large amounts from the Government of the United States.

The article in the New York Times is as follows:

[From the New York Times]

EXPECT SHIP LINES TO MERGE SERVICES—OBSERVERS IN BRITAIN LOOK FOR COLLABORATION OF WHITE STAR AND UNITED STATES VESSELS—"LEVIATHAN" IS INVOLVED—"MAJESTIC" AND "OLYMPIC" ALSO NAMED AS LIKELY TO BE USED IN WEEKLY ATLANTIC RUN

SOUTHAMPTON, ENGLAND, April 10.—A close working arrangement between the White Star Line and the United States Lines is expected to emerge before summer, with the Leviathan, Majestic, and Olympic joining in a weekly trans-Atlantic service.

This expectation springs partly from an announcement that henceforth the White Star Line will direct all the United States Lines' operations at Southampton. The local office of the American organization has been closed, and beginning with the President Roosevelt's arrival Thursday en route to New York the White Star Line will dispatch all the United States Lines' vessels.

It thus happens that the International Mercantile Marine will have the White Star's agency in the United States and the White Star Line will direct International Mercantile Marine vessels here. At the same time it is officially stated that the Homeric not only will spend the summer cruising but will be used several months after the summer season in short trips from Southampton to various beauty spots.

In view of the recent drastic changes of the Red Star Line, which is associated with the International Mercantile Marine, this is taken to mean that the Homeric, Lapland, and Belgenland will be joined either in cruises or in special service.

In last week's transfer of the Atlantic Transport liners Minnetonka and Minnewaska to the Red Star Line it was announced these would form a weekly service with the Pennland and Westerland. The Belgenland and Lapland are not involved in the transfer, however, and will be free for cruising work.

It is assumed here that all the vessels in the present reshuffle, including the Leviathan, Majestic, and Olympic, will continue to fly their distinctive house flags and stay under their present ownership.

OFFICIALS HERE ARE SILENT

Officials of the United States Lines refused last night to discuss the plans of the company as to its relations with the White Star Line. The Leviathan will return to the trans-Atlantic service on April 26 as a competitor of the White Star liners Majestic and Olympic, thus placing the International Mercantile Marine Co. in the position of agent of the rivals of the ship in which it has an important financial interest.

The United States Lines are owned by a group which includes the International Mercantile Marine and R. Stanley Dollar and Kenneth D. Dawson, Pacific American agent of the White Star Line.

This situation has been the subject of much discussion in shipping circles, where it is believed the schedules of the three ships will be arranged to reduce the competition to a minimum.

Mr. President, I want to add just a word. The International Mercantile Marine, which has a contract, according to its president, by which in the event of trouble between England and any other country its lines can be taken over and used by Great Britain, through purchase of the United States Lines, is drawing a subsidy from the American Government.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—ERADICATION OF GRASSHOPPERS

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to propound a question to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] with relation to the agricultural appropriation bill. I know the difficulty he has had in getting the conference agreement back. The Northwest is particularly interested at this time in the grasshopper item. The grasshoppers are hatching, and the funds the Senate voted and the conferees agreed to should be available at this time. The bill, of course, is tied up, and the point will soon be reached where the appropriation will not be of any service. Can the Senator from Oregon tell us something about that?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill has been withheld, along with other appropriation bills, until the House should have decided on the action it will take with respect to the economy bill, which is now before them for consideration and which probably will reach a final vote to-day. As soon as action has been taken by the House on that bill, I promise to bring the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill before the Senate, I hope within the next two or three days.

Mr. NORBECK. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair say for the information of the Senator from South Dakota that even in that event no amendment may be offered. The remedy of the Senator from South Dakota, if the Chair may be permitted to say so, is to introduce as a separate piece of legislation what he now proposes as an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is a different thing, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from South Dakota to wish to offer an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; to the pending bill. As I understand it, the grasshopper provision is in the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. I have just explained that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would rather have it go through as a separate appropriation than to have to bring in the agricultural appropriation bill at this time.

Mr. McNARY. It is well known that the item is in the agricultural appropriation bill now in conference. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] also has pending a joint resolution asking for separate action upon that item. This evening I intend to ask the Senate to adjourn so we may have a morning hour to-morrow and he can perhaps bring it up to-morrow during the morning hour.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would have no objection if it really involves necessary action at this time.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, may I say that the amendment which I have offered ordinarily would be subject to a point of order simply because it was not offered at an earlier time. It has a Budget estimate and is in order, and I do not believe there will be any objection to it.

ADDRESS BY JOUETT SHOUSE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an illuminating addresss by the chairman of the Democratic National Executive Committee, Mr. Jouett Shouse, March 3, 1932.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

"THE G. O. P. WAR SONG OF 1928 BECOMES THE ALIBI OF 1932"

In common with many millions of other Americans I had been under the impression that the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, bringing to a close the hostilities of the World War. For years I had persisted in this mistaken belief and was not set right in my thinking until I listened to the speech of the eminent Dr. SIMEON D. FESS, chairman of the Republican National Committee, in this radio hour last Tuesday night.

It was apparent from his remarks that the armistice was not signed until November 11, 1929, instead of November 11, 1918, and that all the ills from which the American people have suffered during the two years and four months of the Hoover panic had their origin in the World War. This was Doctor FESS's explanation for the disruption of industry, the destruction of agriculture, the failure of banks, the suffering and privation and fear that have come to the multiplied millions of unemployed and the even greater millions of their dependents. It is true the good doctor made no reference to suffering humanity. He cited no figures on unemployment. He did graciously admit that through causes which no agency could control there had been an occasional bank failure, or, perhaps more nearly interpreting his view, an occasional instance of frozen assets which for a brief time compelled a curtailment of loans necessary to the carrying forward of industry. But the whole grievous weight of responsibility for the most severe and long-drawn-out depression the country has ever known was laid at the doorstep of the World War.

CONTRAST WITH 1928 CONVENTION SPEECH

In curious contrast to this radio address of the chairman of the Republican National Committee I happen to recall his speech as temporary chairman of the Republican Convention at Kansas City in June of 1928. He then devoted himself to a review of the conditions that had prevailed at the close of the World War in 1918. According to his testimony, under the misfortune of Democratic rule the country had fallen to the lowest possible estate. Then the Republican Party had again taken charge of the Government and as a result of the wisdom and the ability of Republican Congresses and Republican Presidents the whole dismal picture had been changed into one of unbelievable brilliancy and beauty.

He said: "In a comparatively short period we are passed from war confusion to peace contentment; from economic disorders to sound principles of progress; from a period of general prostration to one of substantial prosperity in which all basic industries are on sound economic foundations. This remarkable record in administration reflects a type of political leadership at the head of the Government rarely experienced in this or any other country."

And yet we now find the head of the Republican National Committee, who in 1928 described in such glowing terms the manner in which his party had met and had solved every postwar problem, attempting to tell you that the postwar problems have not been solved.

This is but a typical illustration of the expedients to which our Republican friends are forced to resort in an attempt to defend themselves from the wrath of the American people which is about to descend upon their sacred heads.

HOOVER—LINCOLN—WASHINGTON

The remainder of the remarks of the good doctor were directed to a laudation of President Hoover, to an enumeration of what he sought to define as the Hoover program of rehabilitation, and to claims of leadership on the part of the President so amazing that the world has never seen its like before. Well, it is a weakness of the good Doctor FESS to look upon the Republican who happens at the moment to be President of the United States as the greatest man that the world has ever produced. In such terms he lauded Harding. With such extravagance he praised Coolidge. Now he finds in Hoover the brightest star in the whole Republican galaxy, and again he bows down in obeisance to worship at the feet of his temporary king.

With such laudation the American people will not be deceived. On Lincoln's Birthday, through concerted action of the official family of the President, exploited by the publicity division of the Republican National Committee, every spokesman who could be summoned to the hustings devoted himself to a eulogy of Herbert Hoover. The average auditor must have been confused as to whether it was Lincoln's Birthday or Hoover's that was being celebrated. As part and parcel of the same picture you will recall the address by the President himself at Valley Forge some months ago in which he compared the difficulties and discouragements of his situation to the trials that had confronted Washington. Is it any wonder that an Ohio newspaper recently said that he had better be watched at Easter time?

I have no unkind personal word to voice relative to the President. I have pity for him. With all due regard to his unusual abilities, the fact remains that he has proved the most inept, the most ill-suited man who has held the presidential chair in many years. In other lines of endeavor a great success, in this high office he is a monumental failure. And yet when any Democrat seeks to criticize an official act of the administration, a sin of either omission or commission, he is accused by White House spokesmen of attempting to "smear" the President of the United States.

INDIVIDUAL CITIZENS MAKE PUBLIC OPINION

Let me offer this thought for your consideration: It is not public opinion at Washington which controls. It is the conclusion reached by the individual citizen in his individual community, no matter how remote, that determines the thought and ultimately the action of the American people. Go to any section of any State of this Union and ask a dozen average men their feelings about the present administration and you will get a correct index as to the situation. If President Hoover is unpopular it is not due to propaganda from the Washington headquarters of the Democratic National Committee. If President Hoover is regarded as a wholly incompetent President it is not because of what Washington correspondents have written. It is because of the inevitable impression left by the acts of the man himself. It is because of the sifted and balanced judgment which the people have formed.

DIVIDED CREDIT ON RELIEF MEASURES

What of this program of relief that has been passed by Congress these last three months? I am willing to accord that every measure is a desirable and necessary piece of legislation. I am glad to accredit the President with having brought to the attention of Congress some of these legislative proposals. I earnestly hope that each of them may meet the situation it is intended to correct. But first I challenge the authorship of this program by President Hoover. In it there are measures which he proposed. In it equally are measures which have been proposed by others, some of them over a period of years.

But even if President Hoover were the author in conception and in substance of every one of these measures, why did he wait all this time to bring them up? The panic is more than two years old. Until a year ago he had an overwhelming congressional majority of his own party. He could have convened the present Congress months in advance of its December session. But never a word then.

Again, for the sake of argument, granting him full credit for authorship of the proposals, what is the situation that has made their enactment possible? Last December for the first time since 1917 the Democratic Party by a clear majority of its own membership elected the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and under the forceful leadership of that forceful man, despite the fact that he has a majority of only three of his party behind him, the Seventy-second Congress has made a legislative record rarely equaled in the annals of this country. There is no measure which President Hoover might have suggested which could not have been defeated immediately had the Democrats of the House so desired.

The situation in the Senate is scarcely dissimilar. There the Hoover party had a majority of 16 seats in the last Congress. In 1930 its predominance was brought down to a mere plurality of one. From the very beginning of his term the President showed himself wholly incapable of leading his party in the Senate, and to-day with the Republicans rifted and divided the only cohesive force in that body is the Democratic party. If in the Senate, as in the House, Democratic leadership had set out to thwart and to embarrass and to throttle legislation proposed by the administration, it would not have been possible to pass a single one of the so-called reconstruction measures.

RESULTS OF DEMOCRATIC COOPERATION

And so I assert that even if President Hoover had been the author of this legislative program in its entirety, which he was not, the passage of it could not have been accomplished in any possible way except through Democratic cooperation. That cooperation has enabled the initiation and the partial completion of an excellent program. Under it we have seen enacted into law the year's moratorium of war-debt payments; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill setting aside $500,000,000 to break the dam that has been choking the free flow of business and to prove a tonic to the whole economic structure by reason of its ability to establish a billion and a half additional credit; the addition of $120,000,000 to the capital stock of Federal land banks to continue unimpaired the solvency of those institutions; the amendment to the Federal reserve act to provide an emergency circulation of Federal reserve notes based on Federal bonds, to make available for discount many millions of additional paper and to revitalize the confidence of bankers and bank depositors alike in the existing financial system.

There is no better illustration than this last-mentioned piece of legislation of the absurdity of the claim of administration origin of all important measures. The bill itself was introduced in the Senate by Senator GLASS of Virginia, in the House by Congressman STEAGALL of Alabama, both of them Democrats. It was founded on a principle which Democratic leaders have been advocating for 30 years and which Republicans have invariably flaunted and ridiculed. Even as recently as six weeks ago the then Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew Mellon, and the assistant who succeeded him, Ogden Mills, emphatically disapproved the bill. But in spite of this fact apologists for the administration attempt to give credit to the President for it.

DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY REAL

But perhaps the most important thing that has been done by this Democratic House, which has utterly refuted all the Republican prophecies of disorder that would ensue, is the strict program of economy that it has inaugurated. The President has talked economy, and his Budget officials, facing deficits running into billions, have cut departmental estimates. But the Democratic House has not contented itself with accepting the mere recommendations of the Budget Bureau. Its leaders have felt that in this period of distress economy that is real is one of the most vital concerns of the Government. At a result, in the appropriation bills which thus far have passed the House and in the two reported out of the committee and now pending a saving has been effected up to 3 o'clock this afternoon (March 3) of $114,579,052.56 below the figures submitted by the Budget Bureau.

And one thing else. There will be a consolidation of bureaus and departments of the Government, but it will be effected as it should be effected by the Congress. It will not be placed in the hands of the President as he sought to have done.

This is only a partial review of what a Congress under Democratic leadership has been able to accomplish in three months. Its work so far is an assurance that it will continue to be careful, painstaking, unhurried, and duly attentive to the interests of the whole people.

DEMOCRATIC PROSPECTS

To-day Democratic prospects are brighter than they have been at any time in 20 years. The political trend indicated by the result in every election since 1928 shows no signs of diminution. The prophecies of our adversaries that chaos and riot will characterize our national convention will prove to have as little basis in fact as their prediction of a disorderly breakdown when it became evident that the Democrats were to control the House. There is an abundance of material of the highest class from whom the Democratic candidate may be chosen. The vigor of competition for the nomination is good for the party.

In the same hall at Chicago within two weeks of each other the two conventions will meet. Grudgingly, unwillingly, sullenly the Republicans will renominate Herbert Hoover. The Democrats, celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of Democratic conventions with a buoyancy and an enthusiasm born of justified expectation of success, will write a platform and will nominate a ticket to offer to the American people. And the American people will have the opportunity, in the remote places as well as in the centers, on the farms, and in the cities alike, to pass judgment as between the two parties. Uncontrolled by the glamour of oratory, unbiased by extravagant claims or exaggerated promises, they will decide which party offers the greater opportunity for a return to the right to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, to the right to the "enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." I, for one, am wholly content to submit the cause to them.

LETTERS ON TAX BILL

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely wish to state for the benefit of several thousand correspondents that so many letters have been pouring into my office in regard to the tax bill it is physically impossible to answer or acknowledge them in any way. I want this to be a public statement so they may not feel they are being discriminated against or treated with discourtesy. Many of the letters are important, long, and come from distinguished people, very important people. However, at this time, we are working all day long on the revenue bill, and it is absolutely impossible to answer or even to acknowledge the letters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think that statement would apply to a great many of us.

EDITORIAL ON SENATOR GLASS AND THE BANKING SITUATION

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to ask permission to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Columbia (S. C.) State, entitled "Carter Glass and the 'Big Bankers' Three Years Ago."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

CARTER GLASS AND THE "BIG BANKERS" THREE YEARS AGO

One now hears of the "fine times before the smash" in the fall of 1929. But were they so fine? Perhaps there are some who may be interested in noting how the State, which put itself in the position of "the man in the street," viewed the situation on April 3, 1929:

"Langbourne M. Williams, banker, of Richmond, might command more support in his opposition to Senator CARTER GLASS's protest against the extension of credit to operators in a speculative market had he dealt in a business man's arguments instead of the personalities that are usually employed by irresponsible persons.

"Mr. GLASS is a United States Senator. He was Congressman for 16 years. He has been Secretary of the Treasury for two years. He has had conspicuous part in financial legislation, and is quite generally regarded as a student of that subject. When the Federal Reserve Board took measures to check speculation on the New York stock market, which had assumed such proportions as to cause apprehension on the part of the man in the street, it was at least acting in behalf of safety. Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Bank of New York, an institution of huge financial power, led the banking interests seemingly in opposition to the policy of the reserve board by announcing a credit of $25,000,000 from his bank to speculators in stocks; other banks followed suit. Mr. Mitchell is on the directorate of the Federal Reserve Board. Senator GLASS criticized his action in opposition to the board, and declared he should resign from the directorate.

"Mr. Williams, of Richmond, thereupon characterizes the policy of the reserve board—which wise or unwise was taken in the interest of safety—as the 'vicious misconduct of the Federal Reserve Board in attempting to destroy the large business interests of the country.' He writes Senator GLASS: 'I believe it would be far more appropriate that you should resign as Senator from Virginia and let some one of broad and clear vision * * * who is not drowned in self-conceit and narrow-gage thinking, take your place as a real broad-gage representative of Virginia.' And so forth and so on the banker's tirade continues for five or six hundred words.

"This sort of thing is not impressive, and it is certainly jarring when indulged in by the senior member of an important banking house.

"Concluding his letter to Senator GLASS, Mr. Williams says: 'Men of narrow vision do not realize that the money center of the world has moved from London to New York, hence trading in New York has necessarily increased, and, furthermore, the large bills payable of the giant industrial companies have been converted into stocks that are now used as basis of credit instead of having the big banks carry tremendous bills payable of our modern giant corporations as formerly.'

"That is mostly Greek to the man in business throughout four-fifths of the country, and Mr. Williams does not seem to take the existence of that very important man into account. That man has no association with 'modern' giant corporations, but he is apprehensive when he knows that brokers in New York have borrowed twelve hundred million dollars, and when he sees stocks earning 5 per cent quoted at 200. He reads a lot about 'tremendous prosperity,' but he does not see it around him. He does not know what it is all about, but he is uneasy, and it is not healthy for this business man to be apprehensive.

"Perhaps the business man not associated with 'giant corporations' wishes to establish an industry in his town that will give men and women employment and produce real, sound wealth. He makes inquiries of those usually interested in such enterprises, but finds they are not now favorably disposed. They say that 'when things settle down,' when the 'uncertainty of the present situation' passes they may be interested—and so development at that point is checked. Or perhaps the ordinary business man, out in that 'backwoods,' which embraces four-fifths of the country, wishes to expand his business. He has credit and needs money, but he finds that the enormous demand for money, coupled with the huge interest rates paid by speculators for 'call' money, has made money more expensive. He must pay more for what he needs, or defer the expansion of his business. Is that wholesome?

"This plain business man finds himself injuriously affected by the 'orgy' of stock speculation. He might be content to wait upon events if he could believe that advancing stock prices would make other parts of the country wealthy and he would ultimately reap some benefits therefrom; but he can not help asking himself how high those prices will climb, and what will hold them up? He asks himself, Why should 'Three R's' be worth 300 when it earns but 7 per cent? What constitutes prosperity, earnings or paper values? How can paper values be saved from deflation? What will happen if many balloons burst at the same time?

"Those are some of the disturbing questions suggesting themselves to the man in the street. He may be without 'broad vision,' but that is not his fault. If Banker Williams could show him that uncontrolled stock speculation is in his interest and that the policy of the Federal Reserve Board is against his interest, Mr. Williams would be doing legitimate business a great service."

But what was the use of warnings. After that date dozens of Columbians put or kept their money in the stock market. One of the biggest operators in this State, and a personal friend of the writer, assured us we were dead wrong; that what was going on was sound business. He lost heavily. And this stock-gambling orgy was but a repetition of the Florida boom gambling.

CARTER GLASS at that time won the right to have his views on banking, finance, and stock gambling respected. He has proved himself the party's outstanding authority in banking, and should have support in the pending legislation.

DANIEL S. SCHAFFER CO. (INC.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3270) for the relief of Daniel S. Schaffer Co. (Inc.), which was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "appropriated," to insert:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 29, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

May God be merciful unto us and bless us, and help us to rejoice in our labors though under hardship. Upon the breath of our noonday prayer, we pray for our Speaker and all Members of this legislative body. Grant that they may be strong in understanding and that patience and courage may be ministered unto them through the might of our God. Bless this Nation; may knowledge go forth to establish it more and more upon immutable foundations. O lead us all to fear God and keep His commandments. Enlighten our judgment, remove our doubts, and inspire our hopes. Summon us, Almighty God—we will meet the challenge of the hour. Banish misunderstandings that may be due to ignorance and prejudice, and build up mutual confidence and cooperation everywhere, and unto Thy name be praises forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 375. Joint resolution to provide additional appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 4401. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Farnam Street, Omaha, Nebr.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 194) entitled "An act for the relief of Jeff Davis Caperton and Lucy Virginia Caperton."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. NYE and Mr. PITTMAN members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Interior Department.

PROVISION FOR FLYING PAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time for the purpose of referring to a provision in the naval appropriation bill relative to flying pay. Last Sunday some of the papers carried a story that the naval appropriation bill carried a joker respecting flying pay. I am somewhat jealous of the reputation of the Appropriations Committee and also of my own as a member of the committee, and I felt I should make this statement to the House because that bill does not carry any joker. Appropriation bills do not carry jokers. [Applause.]

There was no ambiguity in the report on the bill touching this matter and there was no ambiguity in the statement made to the House by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], who was in charge of the bill, when he announced he would propose a change in the bill respecting flying pay in consequence of an understanding I had had with the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, Admiral Moffett. The facts are—and I wish to repeat them—that the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics talked with me with reference to the provision which was carried in the naval appropriation bill as reported from the committee, placing the maximum limit upon the amount of increased pay which might be paid to a flying officer at $1,100. He stated to me then that if that provision were carried he was afraid it would disrupt the entire Aviation Service of the Navy. He gave me his assurance, and authorized me so to state to the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations, that he would be able to get along administratively if they would cut out that particular language and restrict the appropriation to the amount which had been agreed upon by the subcommittee and approved by the general committee, which was $1,014,250. In other words, that the reduction of $271,890 made by the committee would be absorbed if that language were eliminated. In substance, that was the statement made to the House by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from Kansas at the time read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which was written voluntarily and without request, in which he reiterated, as will appear in that letter and which is to be found on page 8703 of the RECORD, the statement made by Admiral Moffett. I presented the admiral's proposition to the subcommittee, stating it as given to me. It was agreed to by the subcommittee, which concluded to take the admiral at his word and fix the limit at the figure within which he said they could get along, that is, $1,014,250, and that was the proposal made to the House and that has been incorporated in the bill.

Now, what will be the effect of this change in the original plan of the committee? Instead of 958 officers receiving not to exceed $1,100 per annum as flying pay, 783 may continue to draw the pay they are now receiving up to $1,420, and there still will be a surplus of $101,160 available for paying flying pay to such number of the remaining 175, namely, officers in grades from lieutenant commander to rear admiral, both inclusive, as the department may consider necessary should have flight orders.

I understand it is being said now that it was never intended to meet the committee's reduction at the expense of officers or, at least, wholly so; that it was intended to make savings in other directions, including a curtailment of flight orders to enlisted personnel. I submit that the assignments of officers drawing flying pay in grades above lieutenant—and they are enumerated in the hearings on the naval appropriation bill—would impress anyone that we would need go no further than that list to accommodate flight orders to the amount allowed in the bill as it has been approved by the House.

The point of my statement this morning is that the committee acted upon the express agreement of the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics; and if there was any purpose to utilize other funds, of course, that is a matter that was not explained to us and contrary to our understanding.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement, because I think the House should know that the gentleman's understanding was not only with Admiral Moffett but also with the Chief of the Aviation Service in the Army; and if final approval is given to this reduction in flight pay for the Navy, we must in fairness, make the same relative reduction in flight pay for the Army, because there was a definite understanding that like treatment in the matter of flight pay would be accorded to both services.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

JAMES MONROE

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered by my colleague, Hon. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, in the old hall of the house of delegates in the capitol of Virginia on November 10, 1931, at the request of the Governor of Virginia, upon the unveiling of the bust of James Monroe, the fifth President of the United States, who was born 174 years ago this day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

Your excellency, ladies, and gentlemen, James Monroe was born in Westmoreland County, Va., in a few miles of the birthplace of Washington, on April 28, 1758. He was born of goodly stock, in a goodly place, and at a goodly time. His first Westmoreland ancestor was a sea captain, as was John Washington, the father of George. His father, Spence Monroe, was of Scotch descent, and his mother, Elizabeth Jones, of Welsh. His brother, Joseph Jones, of King George County, was a man of great ability, an eminent jurist, and an influential statesman. He was devoted to his nephew, James, and did much to encourage and direct the course of his early life. Monroe's father was a farmer, inheriting and purchasing large tracts of land, discharging with efficiency and fidelity several local public offices, and a signer of the famous Westmoreland resolutions in relation to the British stamp act. James was a boy of 9 at this time, and with a natural aptitude for politics, he must have been impressed by this event.

His birthplace was in an extraordinary environment of nourishing associations and influences. In a radius of 50 miles from his home were living the great thinkers and founders of American free institutions. He was almost in sound of the voices of Washington, Madison, Marshall, George Mason, and the Lees. Substantially within this radius lived Patrick Henry and Samuel Davies, later the first great president of Princeton; Pendleton and Taylor, of Caroline; Francis Corbin, of Middlesex; Carter Braxton, of King and Queen, and John Rodgers Clarke, of Orange. Thomas Jefferson was near by, and, though 15 years older, was his devoted and cherished friend. What commanding contacts! What ennobling and instructive associations! This environment was in itself a subconscious education that ultimately swept him far upon the ocean of fame.

In the narrow sense, his education was limited, as it was of most of the famous men of that day. There were no great school buildings, but there were a few great teachers. Among these was the Rev. William Douglas, probably brought from Scotland by the Monroe family. He taught Thomas Jefferson for four years, and also for a while Monroe. The Henry family secured Thomas Campbell, the poet, but he was compelled to forego his journey to Virginia, and in his stead came Archibald Campbell, his uncle, a fine teacher. Madison attended this school, and it is said that Washington and the elder Marshall did—certain it is that Monroe and John Marshall were here together for two years—here began their lifelong friendship, here they were well grounded in Latin and mathematics, and prepared for college.

What college should Monroe attend? Out of about 120 boys who had gone from Virginia to English universities up to this period 19 came from Westmoreland. But Monroe and his family were intensely Virginians, and naturally he was entered in the College of William and Mary, then the richest college in America and entering upon its golden opportunity, as Williamsburg had now become the new capital of Virginia. The capitol itself was an attractive building, situated at one end of the Duke of Gloucester Street, and the college, the architectural creation of Sir Christopher Wren, stood at the other, in full view each of the other.

Monroe was now a well-grown young man. Tall, square shouldered, sinewy, active and energetic, with a grave face, steady, kindly, penetrating bluish-gray eyes, modest but unafraid. He entered college in the fall of 1774, and he was now in another but invigorating community. He had left the land of the Washingtons and the Lees; he was now in the land of Pocahontas and John Smith, of Wythe, the Randolphs, Tylers, Tuckers, Blairs, Harrisons, Tazewell, and Roane. Here the cultured president and faculty of the college became his immediate and dominating influence. Nor did he lose sight of the House of Burgesses and its political activities, with its varied membership. Bruton Church, with its beauty, dignity, and spiritual appeal, deeply impressed him. Nor was he unmindful of the glamor of the royal governor and his court. Raleigh Tavern was then kept by Anthony Hay, whose son George was to become in due time United States attorney, the official prosecutor of Aaron Burr for treason, United States district judge, and the husband of Eliza, the daughter of Monroe.

The college had not more than 70 matriculates at this time, among whom were three sons of Dunmore and some others who grew to deserved distinction in field and forum and council. Of course, a boy with Monroe's political aptitudes knew all of his classmates! College records give an inadequate picture of the life and activities of students. The bursar's books contain Monroe's expenditures for matriculation and board and keep. There remains, however, a paper in the form of a petition, with Monroe among the signers, protesting against the extravagance and partiality of Mistress Digges, the matron; but upon its hearing by the board, Monroe admitted he signed without reading the paper, an age-old ending of this common and futile procedure. He was a diligent and faithful student, and the training here acquired soon reflected itself in a long, varied, and illustrious public career.

Monroe's college education came to an end in the second year of his matriculation. Rumblings of revolution could be heard from Massachusetts to Georgia, and the great men whom I have heretofore mentioned were especially responsive to the multiplied signs of the time. Patrick Henry's dramatic utterance, "that after all we must fight," was caught up and repeated by the students throughout the college. The resolution of the Virginia convention tion instructing her delegates in the Continental Congress to propose a declaration of independence, and the oppressive acts of Parliament and King were rapidly culminating in this portentous event, which in turn would culminate in a mighty epoch. So Monroe was born at a goodly time.

Monroe's college books were now laid aside. Some 200 Virginia troops quaintly uniformed "in green hunting shirts, homespun, homewoven, and homemade, with the words of "liberty or death" in large white letters on their bosoms," appeared upon the campus, the greens, and the streets of Williamsburg. Monroe was deeply impressed by these troops, for among them was Lieut. John Marshall, his friend and fellow student under Parson Campbell. These were the "minute men" of Culpeper, Fauquier, and Orange. Several of the students of the college rode great distances carrying messages in relation to the impending struggle. Grigsby alludes to "two tall and gallant youths," Monroe and Marshall, about to become officers under General Washington. Marshall became a member of the Eleventh and Monroe of the Third Virginia Regiments. Monroe was also of the small company who moved the arms from the palace to the powder house in Williamsburg, and a little later he was in active service in the far north. He participated in the Battle of Harlem Heights, his company being commanded by Captain Washington, a kinsman of the great general. Monroe was greatly relied upon by his superior officers.

He was with his military unit at White Plains and at Trenton. In the Battle of Trenton the advance guard of the American troops was led by Capt. William Washington and Lieut. James Monroe, repulsing the British and capturing two pieces of artillery in a fierce engagement. Captain Washington received a shot in the wrist and Lieutenant Monroe one through the shoulder, carrying the bullet to his grave. It is believed he crossed the Delaware with George Washington; at any rate, he was among the first and foremost at Trenton.

Monroe's efficiency and gallantry was recognized by General Washington himself, who said: "The zeal he discovered by entering the service at an early period, the character he supported in his regiment, and the manner in which he distinguished himself at Trenton, when he received a wound, induced me to appoint him to a captaincy in one of the additional regiments. This regiment failing, from the difficulty of recruiting, he entered into Lord Stirling's family and has served two campaigns as a volunteer aide to his lordship. He has in every instance maintained the reputation of a brave, active, and sensible officer."

Later he served as an aide with the rank of major on the staff of Lord Stirling, and took part in the Battle of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He was subsequently made lieutenant colonel before he was 21, and displayed great energy and ability as commissioner to investigate and report upon the condition of the southern army, when his military career ended.

Monroe now determined to make his way in civil life, and adopted the legal profession as his calling. He studied law under Thomas Jefferson, which association increased the confidence and affection of each in the other. The political activities of Monroe were now so multiplied that he pursued his practice with many interruptions, but he was a lawyer of learning and ability, as is shown by his selection as one of the famous commission appointed to revise the laws of the new State.

He was early chosen as a delegate to the general assembly from King George County. He became also a member of the executive council, and was elected to the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Congresses of the Confederation. For a second time he was returned to the general assembly, and later became a member of the "great convention" of Virginia that considered the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

His congressional experience under the Articles of Confederation inclined him to a stronger Federal union. A government that could tax but could not collect was an anomaly. In this Congress Monroe became deeply interested in three subjects: The great back, or Western, country; the Mississippi, its navigation and an outlet at New Orleans to the sea (this was the germ and genesis of the Louisiana Purchase); and the regulation of commerce, the matrix of the new Federal Constitution. He drew the famous report in this Congress upon this subject, and its expressions and implications are to the effect that this regulation requires a stronger government. Bancroft thinks Monroe failed to give to this measure which he proposed his full support. The evidence fails to sustain this prejudiced conclusion. No one would have been more critical of this position if true than Jefferson, yet he was then Monroe's warm friend.

He had favored a new Constitution, but in the Virginia Convention he aligned himself with Henry, Mason, and Lee against its ratification and against Washington, Madison, and Marshall. Why this change of front? It required independence and courage to do it. But he lacked neither. He was a man of strong convictions. But now the man of the hour was Madison. Bancroft declares that in this time of despair "the country was lifted by Madison and Virginia." "We now come," says he, "upon the week glorious for Virginia beyond any event in its annals or in the history of any republic that had ever before existed." Virginia evoked and secured the new Federal convention at Philadelphia, which Monroe approved, for he was fundamentally a Union man, though he did not approve all of its work. He made two speeches in the Virginia convention. He thought the consolidation powers too great; there was no bill of rights; the President should hold office for one term of seven years; and the Eastern States might block the development of the central and western sections of the country. He would support the Constitution with amendments but not without them.

Hugh Blair Grigsby writes that: "The speech of Monroe was well received. It made upon the House a strong impression, which was heightened by the modesty of his demeanor, by the sincerity which was reflected from every feature of his honest face, and by the minute knowledge which he exhibited of a historical transaction of surpassing interest to the South." Henry, the greatest of American orators, followed and rose to surpassing heights. Associating himself with a storm that broke upon the building he climaxed the scene with such transcendent oratory that "the members rose in confusion, and the meeting was dissolved." But Washington and Madison won; and in later years the Republic faced a catastrophe that of itself lent much support to Monroe's fears and prophecies. He accepted patriotically the result of the convention, and labored in and out of season to make the new Federal charter operative and successful.

Notwithstanding his objections to the Constitution, which were soon substantially removed by amendments as the result of the fight made by Henry, Mason, and himself, he became a candidate for the First Congress, and by the irony of fate his opponent was his friend, James Madison. He should not have opposed Madison, but no doubt he became a candidate by reason of the persistence of Henry and other friends of the Virginia convention. It was a unique and picturesque campaign, resulting in Monroe's defeat by a majority of 300.

But the new Congress was soon to find him in its higher branch. Virginia's first Senators were Richard Henry Lee and William Grayson, a near kinsman of Monroe, and who with Lee had also opposed the new Federal Constitution. Grayson lived but a short while and Monroe was elected by the general assembly to the vacancy, taking his seat in December, 1790, at the age of 32, and serving until May, 1794. Thus Monroe was again in close touch with his friend Thomas Jefferson, who was then at the seat of government in Philadelphia as Secretary of State in Washington's Cabinet.

Monroe was a hard-working Senator. He spoke infrequently, but practically and rigidly to the point. His committee assignments were good, and he was most industrious in performing his duties. He was pronounced in his opinions, which in a political sense tended to the liberalism of the school of Jefferson. Gouverneur Morris's confirmation as minister to France and Jay's to England were opposed by Monroe. He thought Jay's position as to the Mississippi radically wrong.

Monroe seems to have looked forward to a long senatorial career. He purchased a home in Albemarle County near Monticello and worked upon the revision of laws of Virginia. But suddenly the stage of his activities shifted. He was taken from the Senate, so to speak, and, to his great surprise, nominated by the President and quickly confirmed as minister to France. He arrived in Paris on August 2, 1794, but was not officially received until August 15. The French Revolution was rolling along on its bloody way; Robespierre expired under the ax of his Brutus and organized government for appropriate reception of foreign diplomats was nebulous. The committee of public safety hesitated to receive him. He took the bull by the horns after 10 days' waiting and addressed the president and representatives of the convention, stating that he did not know the competent department nor the forms established by law for his reception.

A decree was at once passed inviting him to the bosom of the convention. He promptly accepted, making his address in English, with a translation in French, that was read by the secretary, together with two letters from Edmund Randolph, the American Secretary of State. The speech was dignified and glowing in style. It made a profound impression, and was printed by order of the convention in two languages, "French and American." He was enthusiastically received, the president giving him the fraternal embrace or accolade. The whole ceremony was novel and dramatic. Monroe was then most cordially welcomed by officials and citizens, and the success of his mission seemed assured. But diplomacy is a fickle jade, and ambushes lay on every side. Jay was at St. James. He had negotiated a treaty with England which was very offensive to the French, to a majority of the American people, and to Monroe. America was practically facing war with both nations, and Jay's treaty threw America into the arms of Great Britain and into the face of France. Monroe's government had not apprised him of the text or contents of this treaty until it reached the public. He was just incensed at this, for he had no opportunity to parry or soften its effect upon the French. Then, too, Randolph thought Monroe was too glowing in his address, that he had gone beyond the scope of his agency, and severely criticized his conduct.

Monroe was recalled by Pickering, Randolph's successor, on August 22, thus serving at the French post 13 days, but he did not take his leave until December 30. He was very indignant. He avouched his letter of instructions from Randolph, submitting his actions to be fully within the scope of his instructions. And they clearly were. But really Monroe was in no way to blame. There was nothing that he did or failed to do that was incompatible with his instructions or his mission. Under the guise of neutrality our Government preferred Great Britain, although it had previously preferred France under the treaty of 1778. A govenment which practices neutrality should be most rigid in applying the same treatment to all neutral nations. The Secretary had bungled and Monroe had to suffer. Monroe returned to Virginia and wrote a lengthy defense of some five hundred pages. It is an interesting and able document and vindicated him at home, for he was elected Governor of Virginia in 1799, and twice reelected, holding office until 1802. He was again elected in 1811, but resigned to enter the Cabinet of Madison.

Within the limitations of my time no adequate discussion can be made of his conduct as Governor of Virginia. Monroe was very thorough, painstaking, a master of details, courageous, and just minded. He was temperamentally an administrator. He acted with energy, decision, and humaneness in his first administration in an uprising of some thousand or more negroes led by two slaves, General Gabriel and Jack Bowler, for the destruction of Richmond.

Jefferson, the Secretary of State, had no hazy ideas about New Orleans. He knew its possession by the United States was essential to its safety and development, and he was alarmed at its retrocession by Spain to France. The former nation was a languid owner, and we could live side by side with her without difficulty for some time to come. Not so with France. Jefferson said: "The day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to retain her forever within the low-water mark. It seals the union of two nations who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation." The letter containing these graphic observations was sent to Livingston, our minister at Paris, by Du Pont Nemours, who was requested to see Napoleon unofficially and impress upon him "the idea that if he should occupy Louisiana, the United States would wait a few years until the next war between France and England, but would then make common cause with England."

Livingston made slow headway in acquiring New Orleans. He wrote Madison on January 13, 1802, that there "was no government where less could be done by negotiations than France." "There are," he said, "no people, no legislature, no counselors. One man is everything * * *. He seldom asks advice and never hears it unasked. His ministers are mere clerks, and his legislature and counselors parade officers." A graphic picture of Bonaparte is this. Jefferson and Livingston did not fully agree, the latter holding the opinion that "so long as France conforms to existing treaties" between the United States and Spain it would be unwise to oppose the transfer of this territory to France. So Jefferson needed some one in France other than Livingston, and Monroe was that man. His nomination as envoy extraordinary to France was sent to the Senate on January 10, 1803. He was quickly confirmed, and lost no time in sailing, which he did upon a ship of 400 tons named Richmond.

Parenthetically it is interesting to observe that almost at this precise time Jefferson recommended Lewis and Clark for the exploration of the upper Mississippi River and the northwestern country.

Livingston wished the assistance of Monroe, to whom he wrote a welcoming letter upon his arrival at Havre on April 10, 1803. "I congratulate you," said Livingston, "upon your safe arrival. We have long and anxiously waited for you. God grant that your mission may answer your and the public expectation. War may do something for us; nothing else would. I have paved the way for you, and if you could add to my memoirs an assurance that we were now in the possession of New Orleans, we should do well."

The evidence shows that on this very day, April 10, Easter Sunday, Bonaparte discussed New Orleans with Talleyrand and Marbois. They were divided in opinion, and the conference was carried far into the night, the ministers remaining at St. Cloud. About daybreak Bonaparte, having received alarming dispatches from England, summoned Marbois, and said, "I renounce Louisiana. Negotiate for its cession. Don't wait for Monroe. I want 50,000,000 francs; for less I will not treat. Acquaint me day by day, hour by hour, with your progress. Keep Talleyrand informed." New Orleans was now embraced in the larger cession. Bonaparte needed money for his war; so he and he alone initiated the larger transaction. Livingston did not do it; Monroe did not do it; Bonaparte did it. When he wished to do a thing he had no illusions and no scruples. Marbois told Livingston of Bonaparte's offer, and Livingston at once undertook to anticipate and exclude Monroe in the negotiations, and latterly contended that Monroe had nothing to do with the transaction. Livingston and the United States were after New Orleans, whereas Bonaparte surprised the envoys by offering to sell the whole of Louisiana.

This territory was then offered to the United States for 100,000,000 francs and the payment of the claims of American nationals.

Livingston pronounced the consideration exorbitant; he could reach no conclusion without consulting Monroe; but Livingston sat up until 3 o'clock at night writing a dispatch to Madison apprising him of the interview with Marbois, and declaring that the purchase was wise. Livingston also made the astounding suggestion that if the price was too high, the outlay might be reimbursed by the "sale of territory west of the Mississippi, with the right of sovereignty to some power in Europe whose vicinity we should not fear." Livingston and Monroe then agreed to give 50,000,000 francs, but in the spirit of trade offered 40,000,000, one-half to be returned to American claimants. Marbois regretted that we could not give more, and declared that he must consult the consul before he could accept. Latterly Marbois proposed 80,000,000 francs, and our envoys at last acceded to his figures. Thus ended the largest real-estate transaction that the world has ever known, which was conducted by Bonaparte with as much nonchalance as if the property was a small town lot. He remarked exultingly to the envoys, "I have given to England a maritime rival that will sooner or later humble her pride"; and upon taking leave of Monroe on June 24 he declared "that the cession he had made was not so much on account of the price given as for the motives of policy; and that he wished for friendship between the Republics." This great man was not very veracious.

The development of our country is closely connected with this famous purchase. Without it perhaps there would have been no Missouri Compromise, no annexation of Texas, no Northwest Territory, no acquisition of northern Mexico or California, no Nebraska bill, no Indian troubles, no Alaskan Purchase, no Pacific railroads, no Isthmian Canal, no Chinese immigration, perhaps no war between the States, for it is difficult to affirm that any of these controversies or events would have ever been known if Spain, France, or Great Britain had remained in possession of the domain beyond the Mississippi.

Our Government wished to acquire Florida, and Monroe was especially charged to undertake this negotiation with Spain. This duty did not devolve upon Livingston, but we find him trying to anticipate and perhaps supplant Monroe in this negotiation, which conduct throws light upon similar action of Livingston in the Louisiana negotiations. Spain, however, was unwilling to consider the question, which was postponed to the administration of Monroe. No criticism should attach to Monroe. He displayed great tact, industry, and sagacity in the negotiations.

Monroe was not only a special envoy to France but to England and Spain as well. Pinkney, of Maryland, was sent over to assist him in negotiating a treaty with England. After arduous and tactful efforts, and delays by reason of changes and deaths in the English ministry, a treaty was signed. But the exasperating subjects of impressment of American seamen and compensation for loss of American property were not embraced in the document, and Jefferson never transmitted it to the Senate. Monroe and Pinkney were disappointed, for they wished to avoid war, and the former wrote the Secretary of State a full explanation of his conduct.

Monroe had returned home, and was again and for the fourth time elected Governor of Virginia, a very extraordinary expression of the confidence and esteem of those who knew him best.

England and America were now drifting rapidly into collision. The British naval vessel Leopard, asserting the right of search, had wantonly attacked the American frigate Chesapeake off the Virginia capes, again delaying action upon the treaty, which however, was abruptly abandoned when the odious and menacing "Orders in Council" were issued by England, thereby rendering inevitable war between the two nations. Perceval's truculent declaration in February, 1812, that England could not listen to the pretensions of neutral nations caused Russell, the American minister at London, to write home that war could not honorably be avoided. Madison, now President, had exhausted all honorable means to do so, and Monroe, now the new Secretary of State, had long been indefatigable to this end. War was declared on June 18, 1812, the message submitting the question to Congress, as well as the report from the committee headed by the renowned Calhoun, having been written by Monroe himself, Henry Adams to the contrary notwithstanding.

The war opened brilliantly for America on lake and sea, and was likewise conducted from Canada to New Orleans with the humiliating exceptions of Bladensburg and Washington, which were captured and subjected to barbaric usages, to burning without justification both the White House and the Capitol. This invasion roused the pacific Madison, who now threw himself upon the strong arm of Monroe, who was at once made Secretary of War in addition to the portfolio of State which he was filling with efficiency and distinction.

Monroe quickly infused vigor, energy, and optimism in the Army. It may, in passing, be of interest to observe that Monroe's service as Secretary of State was interrupted by four several assignments to perform the duties of Secretary of War. He, as before suggested, endeavored to secure treaties of peace with England; but failing, he saw war as the inexorable and honorable fate, and he did not hesitate so to declare. It should here be said that Monroe's whole conduct in relation to the war was patriotic in conception, and wise and daring in execution. His courage, his self-control, his patience, his incomparable experience, his energy, and his profound and penetrating mind made him more effective than "an army with banners." He was now indeed Madison's right arm!

The war over, the treaty of Ghent ratified, and the Federalist Party dissolving, partisan rancors subsiding, and the dissensions of sections disappearing, Madison, the political philosopher and patriot, realized the triumph of his administration, and was content to trust its justification to posterity.

But the time was approaching for the choice of his successor. Governor Sullivan, of Massachusetts, declared that the Virginians had held the Presidency "as often as they were entitled to," and therefore advocated the election of De Witt Clinton as the successor of Madison. Monroe was nominated in a caucus of the Republican or Democratic Members of Congress over William H. Crawford, of Georgia, by a vote of 65 to 54, and in the Electoral College, with a total vote of 221, Monroe received 183, as against 34 for Rufus King. He was inaugurated March 4, 1817, amidst Senators, Representatives, Galliard, the President of the Senate, and Henry Clay, the Speaker of the House, foreign ministers, Justices of the Supreme Court, including the illustrious Chief Justice Marshall, who administered the oath of office to the new President. Boys at Campbell's School, now standing face to face on the same platform, had become the two greatest living figures in the world.

What an incomparable career was Monroe's! Lieutenant in the Continental Army and lieutenant colonel before he was 21; military commissioner to the Southern Army; member of the General Assembly of Virginia; member of the executive council; member of the Continental Congress; member again of the general assembly; member of the Virginia convention to ratify the Federal Constitution; United States Senator; member of commission for revising the laws of Virginia; twice minister to France; four times governor of Virginia; minister to England and Spain; signer of the treaty acquiring Louisiana; third time member of the General Assembly of Virginia; Secretary of State; Secretary of War; twice President of the United States; author of the Monroe doctrine; visitor of the University of Virginia; member and president of the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829–30; and justice of the peace.

'"Thou hast it now, King, Cawdor, Glamis, all,
As the weird woman promised."

I will pass briefly to consider him as the fifth President of the United States. Twice was he President, and the second time elected with but one dissenting vote. This was the "era of good feeling." He was a successful and able Chief Magistrate; impeccably honorable and self-sacrificingly patriotic. The Federalist party disappeared under his administration, and he received substantially the united support of his countrymen. But I can only consider one of his many administrative achievements, and that is America's greatest foreign policy, for which his name is the synonym—"The Monroe doctrine."

Was Rush, Adams, Canning, Jefferson, Madison, or Monroe the author of this doctrine? The evidence of record is perfectly clear that Monroe himself and no one else was its author. He wrote it, signed it, and sent it to Congress. No other is responsible for it. It was Monroe's doctrine, and since its promulgation it has borne no other name than his. Envy, jealousy, prejudice, and ignorance have alone sought to impair Monroe's authorship of this contribution to American politics. Of course, he sought information and advice from informed and responsible statesmen. Why not? But does this absolve him from the responsibility and authorship of the paper?

Upon the fall of Napoleon, who had upset several of the European monarchies, a so-called Holy Alliance was instituted by Alexander I of Russia, and signed by Francis of Austria, Frederick William of Prussia, and Louis XVIII of France. The alliance was neither holy nor Roman. It was a euphemistic title to conceal intrigues and to restore and extend European monarchies. One conspicuous design was to smother the fires in those South American countries that had been kindled by Miranda, Bolivar, and San Martin, and therein lurked the danger to the free institutions of the United States. Monroe sensed this. Canning suggested joint action by Great Britain and the United States to meet this unholy design. Monroe did not accept this offer, declaring what should be done must be done by the United States alone of or for itself.

Monroe sent his message to Congress containing this doctrine in December, 1823, just as the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress of Panama was being debated. Adopting the digest made by Mr. Clark, sometime Under Secretary of State, the message substantially declares:

1. The "American Continents," that is, North as well as South America, were not subject to colonization by any European power. This was concretely aimed at Russia, who was about to initiate such an undertaking in the far Northwest of the United States.

2. The United States would consider any attempt of the "allied powers" to extend their system to any part of "this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety."

3. "With existing colonies or dependencies of any European powers we have not interfered and shall not interfere."

4. With respect to Spanish colonies which had declared and maintained their independence and which we had recognized, the United States "could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or of controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

5. The United States declared that it was impossible for these powers to extend their political system to North or South America "without endangering our peace and happiness," and that such interposition could not be considered with indifference.

6. The true policy was to leave Spain and her seceded colonies to adjust their differences between themselves. Thus the declaration falls into two divisions: Future colonization by any European power of the American Continent, and "interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or of controlling in any other manner their destiny." The inhibitions apply to European powers, not to those of South or North America. The doctrine in origin and application is wholly one of self-preservation. The foothold of such powers upon this continent inevitably meant aggression upon the United States. This is practically the beginning and end of the doctrine that has become the fixed policy of our Government which no informed and responsible American statesman will disregard.

James Monroe, while a member of the Continental Congress sitting in New York, married Elizabeth Kortright, of that city, in February, 1786. She was the daughter of Laurence Kortright, well known and well connected, and a lady of intelligence and culture. From a miniature of her painted in Paris, which Monroe thought her best likeness, she was of extraordinary beauty, which together with her tact and charm made her perhaps the most attractive chatelaine who ever lived in the White House, not excepting Dolly Madison. Several competent men and women who met them both were more attracted by Mrs. Monroe. Of this marriage there were two daughters, Eliza and Maria Hester, the former married George Hay, of whom I have heretofore spoken, and the latter Samuel Gouverneur, of New York; and some of the descendants of these daughters lend their presence to this occasion. Eliza went to school to the famous Madame Campan, and became a schoolmate of Hortense de Beauharnais, the daughter of Josephine, who married Louis Bonaparte and became the mother of Napoleon III. She presented her own miniature to Eliza together with a lock of her hair.

It was at the home of his daughter Maria in New York that Monroe died on July 4, 1831, at the age of 73, his remains resting in that city until July 4, 1858, when they were removed with impressive ceremony and reinterred in our own Hollywood. The remains of his wife, who died at Oak Hill, in Loudon County, some few years before his death, rest beside his tomb. Three Presidents of the United States died on the 4th of July—Jefferson, Adams, and Monroe—the two former dying in the same year, 1826.

Monroe has not had full justice done him. He was malignantly criticized by his political partisans, and these criticisms have been magnified by some later writers.

He was an exemplary character. Jefferson affirmed that if his soul could be turned wrong side out you would not find a speck upon it. His honor and courage and patriotism equaled that of any of our Presidents. He was also a man of great abilities. John Quincy Adams, his Secretary of State, and subsequently President, entertained for his ability and character the greatest admiration. Calhoun thought his intellect of extraordinary power and penetration, declaring his capacity to consider a given subject, stripped of all irrelevant issues and detached from all personal bias, to be equal to that of any man he ever knew. Lord Holland, in speaking of Monroe and his colleague Pinkney, whom he met in the negotiations about the English difficulties, declares that Monroe "had candor and principle"; that he was "diligent, earnest, sensible, and even a profound man"; and that while Pinkney was more attractive and brilliant, his "opinions were neither so firmly rooted nor so deeply considered as those of Monroe."

Trevelyan, in his The American Revolution, declares that "the junior officer in William Washington's company was a lad even younger than Hamilton, and not his equal (as, indeed, very few were) in intellectual endowments or in personal charm. And yet," said he, "if in the course of ages both their memories were to perish, that of Lieutenant Monroe would in all likelihood be the last forgotten of the two, for he was the James Monroe who, in December, 1823, as the fifth President of the United States, enunciated the policy which defeated the machinations of the Holy Alliance and which deprived Spain of her American Colonies."

Thus great achievements and their makers live and endure.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PORTO RICO

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1932.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inform you that the certificate of appointment of Hon. JOSÉ L. PESQUERA as Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. Felix Cordova Davila, in due form of law, has been filed in this office.

Yours very truly,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

SWEARING IN OF RESIDENT COMMISSIONER

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, Hon. José L. PESQUERA is present and desires to take the oath of office.

Mr. PESQUERA appeared in the well of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

THE ECONOMY BILL

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the economy bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, from the information that I have gathered from advocates of salary cuts, it seems that the real motive for reducing Federal salaries is to produce "a favorable psychological effect" throughout the country. The reduction in the wages of these employees certainly can not be claimed to save sufficient money to balance the Budget or wipe out the deficit. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, the deficit was $902,023,828.11, and the estimated deficits for the years 1932 and 1933 are placed at $2,122,961,000 and $1,420,142,248, respectively, so that we can readily see that if no salaries at all were paid to any Federal employees these deficits would not be wiped out, for the total annual pay roll of our Government amounts to approximately $1,215,000,000.

A recent investigation by the Bureau of the Budget shows that there are 732,460 civilian employees and 290,913 officers and enlisted men of the Army and the Navy on the Government pay roll; the average salary of the civilian employees is $1,441 per year and of the members of the military service $893 per year. This compares with an average wage of $1,553.58 per annum paid to employees in the Cincinnati, Ohio, industrial area, as compiled by the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce. From these figures we can readily see that the claim being made that the Government employees are being paid more than those in private industries is not based on facts.

What psychological effect will a reduction of wages in the Government service have? Will the millions of working men and women in the country breath easier and feel more confident of their own jobs and salaries when Federal wages are reduced, or will they feel that the Government has set an example for private industries to follow? I believe that the latter will be the case.

What effect would a reduction of, let us say, 10 per cent on Federal salaries have on the restoration of confidence, which I think we must all admit will do more to restore good times than any legislative action Congress may take? Will not the buying power of the Federal employee be reduced by the amount of the reduction? These men and women in my city of Cincinnati are to-day, and have been during this period of depression, helping to provide for relatives out of employment, and are also donating a portion of their salaries to a fund for the relief of the poor and unemployed. They have been the target of every charity drive during the depression, and have contributed freely and generously. If salaries are reduced, these contributions will decrease in amount and number, if they are not totally discontinued. In the case of practically every Federal employee, his family is living on the budget system. Many of them have purchased their own homes and are making weekly payments thereon; an amount is set aside each week for food and clothing, school supplies for the children, and other necessaries of life, and little, if anything, is left after these obligations are met for the so-called luxuries.

The United States Bureau of Efficiency informs me that there are approximately 3,033 Federal employees in greater Cincinnati, receiving $6,352,960 from the Government annually in the form of salaries. A 10 per cent reduction in their wages would mean that they would have $635,296 less to spend than in the past; and if the Bureau of Efficiency is correct, this would mean a reduction in buying power of $4,447,072, for it is claimed that the dollar turns over seven times each year. The merchants in and around Cincinnati will suffer a loss in business in this amount—a loss which to-day they can not stand. Properties will become vacant, mortgages will be foreclosed, and bankruptcies will increase.

Of the 3,033 Federal employees in the city of Cincinnati, 2,565 receive less than $2,500 annually, and their total salaries amount to $4,819,579 each year, while only 468 employees receive more than $2,500 per year.

I am for economy in government, but not for economy at the expense of reducing the standard of living of the working people of the Nation. If the Federal Government sets the example by reducing salaries of the employees in the lower pay grades, private business will follow with more drastic cuts, and all we can look for is a retarding of economic recovery. It will indicate that Congress has lost faith in the future.

Government economies that would save many times the amount involved in a possible salary slash can be effected with less difficulty. There are to-day 10 departments, 135 bureaus, and 40 independent commissions in the Government. The unification and coordination of these, with a general reorganization of all of the departmental functions, would effect a saving of many times the amount that would be saved by a salary cut. Let us start there, and then, if more savings be necessary, reduce salaries in the higher brackets—above the $2,500-a-year man. I am perfectly willing to vote for a reduction for myself and others in the higher salary brackets if the saving effected will materially help put this country on a sound economic basis and restore its credit, but the fallacy of such salary reductions in the lower grades is too evident at this time, and I shall vote against them.

PREPAYMENT OF ADJUSTED COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the proposed prepayment of the adjusted-service compensation certificates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the continued and persistent agitation at this time of the so-called bonus proposals is, I believe, doing immeasurable damage to the country. It is unfortunate that our veterans are being misled to think that their country is treating them ungenerously at the very moment when the National Government is spending for their benefit a third of all the taxes it collects. It is regrettable that many of those who served so valiantly in the World War are being persuaded that the Government is withholding from them billions of dollars which are now their due, when this is not the fact. It is still more deplorable that they are being induced to advocate a proposal which not improbably would plunge our country into economic troubles far greater than any we have yet experienced.

Mr. Speaker, the mere advocacy of this proposal is thwarting every constructive effort to restore confidence and revive activity in business. Its ramifications and possibilities, I believe, are of more serious import to the country—and by the country I mean all of us—than any other matter before the present Congress, and on that account I have asked permission to print in the RECORD certain thoughts on the subject that I have tried to express to the Ways and Means Committee.

My statement before that committee was made on April 22, and was as follows:

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I may be permitted a personal word along the line of the discussion that has just preceded, I came to Congress when the question of the so-called bonus was very much in the foreground. I felt that the original payment of $60 for a veteran when he returned home from the war was a pitiful and niggardly allowance, and I was from the beginning an advocate of the bonus, or adjusted compensation, as it is more deservedly called. I believed that it was not a gratuity, but an obligation, and that it was fully justified; and, I opposed at that time, on the floor of the House and elsewhere, the statements which were made by Mr. Mellon, the then Secretary of the Treasury, that we could not pay the bonus without impairing the credit of the Government, and that we should not be able to reduce taxes, or go on retiring the debt if the bonus were paid. I protested against those assertions, and I twice voted for the measure over the President's veto.

THE BASIS OF THE BONUS

The statement that has just been made by Congressman LEA as to the calculations about the payment, tallies with my memory of what was agreed upon at the time and the reason for it. When the adjusted-service certificate was authorized in 1924, the period in which the veterans' need was greatest, which was when he left the Army, had passed, and it was felt by the leaders of the veterans' organizations at that time that it was to the interest of the veteran himself—at that time they were generally employed—not to give him money, which he would be apt to spend at once, but to give him instead a much larger sum in its face value in the form of an endowment-insurance certificate. The dollar a day for home service and the dollar and a quarter a day for foreign service, to which allusion has been made, were the basis; but 25 per per cent more was added to this basis, and my distinct recollection is that it was added to cover the interest for the period from the time when these men left the service to the time when the so-called bonus certificates were issued. Then this whole total was more than doubled, as has been so often stated, by adding the interest of 4 per cent cumulatively compounded for 20 years, and a 20-year endowment-insurance policy was given the veterans for the full amount, which was nearly three times the cash originally asked for.

To-day I want to address myself briefly to the proposal of our colleague, Mr. PATMAN, that there should be immediately paid—or rather prepaid—the interest for the next 13 years on those certificates, and that provision should be made for that payment by the issue of United States notes to the extent of about $2,400,000,000.

I realize that many veterans, probably the majority of the veterans in the country, would like to have such a prepayment, and have been led to believe that it would be of benefit to them. It is with some regret, therefore, that I feel obliged to oppose them. But I can not do otherwise, because I believe the proposal, if adopted, would involve immense harm to the country and to the veterans themselves. I shall try very briefly to explain the grounds for that belief.

THE COLLAPSE OF CONFIDENCE

We probably should not all agree as to the cause and the sources of the terrible economic depression that confronts this country and the world to-day, but there is one aspect of the crisis upon which there can be little difference of opinion. It will be generally agreed that the situation has been prolonged and has been greatly aggravated because of fear and distrust, and the cumulative pessimism which has pervaded the world as to what lies in the future. It has been like a disease, a nervous disease, which has infected the whole community and left the entire economic organism in a state of complete prostration. There are many people to-day whose incomes, derived from salaries or wages or otherwise, would permit them to buy more than they are buying in the way of comforts and luxuries, but who are so worried about the future that they do not purchase anything aside from the merest necessities. There are plenty of men who could repaint their houses or reroof them, who could buy automobiles, or washing machines, or new clothes for their families, who have ceased doing so out of a nameless fear that an even greater disaster is going to happen, a feeling that they ought to save what they have against some dreadful event that still lies ahead—a worse situation than we have yet experienced.

The storekeepers and merchants in the different cities similarly hesitate to place their usual orders, or such orders as they might easily place, because of fright and dread of something still to come. The manufacturers and heads of industrial plants likewise refuse to improve their factories or to buy machinery which they might very easily buy because of that same anxiety about worse conditions still before us. The banks, in their turn, continue to call their loans, refuse to extend credit, and try to make their assets liquid, because they are also afraid of what may happen in the future. They are constantly confronted by the fear that their depositors, suffering from that same nameless dread, might at any moment withdraw their deposits, institute a run, and force the bank to close its doors.

Back of all this unsettlement and distrust lies a still greater dread—that our Government itself, the last bulwark of our economic defense, may yield under the strain that is placed upon it. Wherever we look to-day throughout the world, whether we look to Europe or to South America or to the Orient, we find government treasuries which have sunk into bankruptcy. Even Great Britain, a country whose economic stability seemed a year ago beyond question, slumped last September into practical insolvency, and this has made our own situation much worse than it was or otherwise would be. Every effort that has been made in this country to revive confidence and start the wheels of business going has been blanketed ultimately by apprehension that our Government may be confronted with the same destiny as so many other governments and that the Treasury of the United States itself may be headed toward insolvency.

CONSTRUCTIVE EFFORTS OF CONGRESS

Our Congress has made very earnest efforts to deal with this baffling crisis. When it was first threatened, in the field of agriculture, we appropriated $500,000,000—perhaps not too wisely—to help the farmers. Since then we have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for road building and for the construction of public buildings which were not necessary at the time, but in the hope that this would increase employment and revive business. Two years ago we agreed to put at the disposal of the veterans $1,200,000,000 not merely to help them but with the hope, which had been promised, that this in its turn would give a new fillip to general trade. This year we liberalized, in the Glass-Steagall Act, the provisions of the Federal reserve laws so as to make available to the country more currency and more credit to the possible extent of many hundreds of millions of dollars.

About three months ago, when banks were failing here and there throughout the country in alarming numbers, and multitudes of families found their bank balances unavailable when they had the greatest need for them, and when the insurance companies, in which sixty or seventy million Americans had invested their savings in the hope of providing for old age or hard times or for their families when they died, were in jeopardy—when it appeared that the insurance companies as well as the banks might be forced into insolvency—Congress adopted another measure. It created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and put at its disposal $500,000,000 more of its own money and offered to guarantee them $1,500,000,000 additional in order to save the depositors in the banks and those who had placed their future in the trust of the insurance companies from a disaster which would have caused untold misery to millions and tens of millions of people.

Now, all of these measures have helped in some degree. The last measure to which I have alluded, as General Dawes said yesterday, has greatly curtailed the closing of banks, has made it possible for some banks to reopen, and enabled their depositors to recover the money which they had intrusted to them. The insurance companies, too, have avoided failure. But throughout all of this tremendous effort there has lurked in the background a fear that is not often named—the fear that the Treasury of the United States might itself yield under the stupendous pressure which has been brought to bear upon it.

THE TREASURY DEFICIT

These different measures to which I have alluded have entailed a tremendous drain upon the National Treasury at the very moment when the Government's sources of taxation and powers of borrowing were withering up. And with the example of other countries in the rest of the world, which, one after another in the course of the last year and mostly since last September, have slumped into insolvency—with that example before them, the fear has grown in the minds of many people that the Treasury of the United States might itself become insolvent.

Now, at the present time in this current year, as we all know, we are confronted in the Treasury with a deficit which will exceed the enormous sum of $2,000,000,000. It may reach two and a half billions. The very proposal at this time that Congress should double this already vast deficit, which is what the bonus proposal would amount to, seems to me to be fraught with grave danger, because it adds to the distrust and the apprehension as to the ability of the United States Treasury to stand the strain.

The proposal which has been made by our colleague to issue 2,400,000,000 more of United States notes could, in my judgment, have but one effect at the present time, if it were adopted. It could not fail to promote a further disturbance of confidence, which is already so badly unsettled. It could not but increase the mistrust and aggravate the pessimism of our people as to the future. It could not but magnify the one thing which, as it seems to me, has prolonged and aggravated this great crisis.

CREDIT, CURRENCY, AND GOLD

It is difficult for many people to realize how tenuous a thing the credit of a country is; how vast and frail a structure is built upon so slight a basis. Yesterday Professor Kemmerer called attention to the fact that the means of exchange in the country consist in the main of some fifty billions of credit accounts in the banks. They are the so-called deposit accounts which are for the most part created, not by deposits of cash, but by the extension of loans to the people. There are 50,000,000,000 of such accounts in the banks of the country, all of which are demand obligations on the banks, yet for the redemption of these accounts the banks hold less than 10 per cent in actual cash, and what is more, that cash in its turn consists largely of credit money which is a demand obligation on the Government payable in gold.

The Federal Government itself has issued a great many different types of fiduciary currency, with which you are all familiar, which the Government is pledged to pay in gold, but which the banks count as part of their reserves. It has issued about five billions of such money, silver certificates, United States notes, Federal reserve notes, and so on. The banks count in their reserves something like a billion and a half of other money than gold. In other words we have about fifty billions of bank deposits and about five billions of paper money, all supposedly payable in gold, but the Treasury and the banks have only about four billions in actual gold with which to pay them.

The banks have demand obligations, payable in lawful money, of about $50,000,000,000, roughly, and against that they hold in cash, including not only gold but all other forms of lawful money, less than one-tenth of that amount; and in turn the Government itself is subject to demands upon it for the redemption in gold of all that lawful money. It has something like three and a half billions of dollars in gold, against which there are outstanding obligations of more than $5,000,000,000 in other forms of money. Whatever the exact percentage may be, a stupendous amount of credit is founded upon a very small basis of gold, and any curtailment of that basis is fraught with danger to the superstructure.

WITHDRAWALS OF GOLD

Last autumn when distrust as to the solvency of the governments of the world was becoming widespread; when in France, for example, they had found that by leaving their balances in London for too long a time, the Bank of France, after the suspension of gold payments by the Bank of England, had to write off a loss of a hundred millions of dollars because of the sudden depreciation, to the extent of one-third of the value of the British pound—at that moment Europeans began to be fearful as to what might happen in this country, and began to call their money back, and in two months time something like $700,000,000 in gold was withdrawn from this country. This was undoubtedly prompted by the fear of the same thing happening to our standard of value as had happened to the British standard of value, and which had entailed upon French investors, and the Bank of France particularly, a loss within a very brief period of a hundred millions of dollars. Our Treasury and our banks were able to stand the strain, but it is doubtful whether they could withstand another drain of like proportions.

I believe that an attempt at this time to issue two billions and more of paper money, if adopted, would result in world-wide distrust in our financial stability and would cause a similar withdrawal of gold from the country, and that this in all likelihood would be accompanied by runs upon our banks by frightened depositors, trying to get hold of gold and gold certificates. This would mean the collapse of our whole banking system, a panic of unexampled proportions, and our forced abandonment of the gold standard. The very agitation of such a proposal to-day serves to arouse apprehension as to the imminence of such a catastrophe and frustrates every hope and effort looking toward an economic revival.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes.

Mr. HILL. What resulted to Great Britain in the matter of withdrawals of gold when they went off the gold basis?

Mr. ANDREW. They went off so suddenly that it was difficult to withdraw the gold. France attempted to withdraw what she had there, but she acted so late that she had already suffered a loss of $100,000,000.

Mr. HILL. That was all on the sterling deposit they had in Great Britain?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. But as to the efflux of gold itself in Great Britain as a result of getting off the gold standard? That is the question I am interested in.

Mr. ANDREW. I could not give you the exact amount, but after the Government suspended gold payments, it was practically impossible to obtain gold in London for export. The situation in Great Britain was quite different from that which might confront a country in consequence of inflation. When Great Britain went off the gold standard, they had not begun to issue paper money, and there was no efflux of gold because of rising prices. They went off the gold standard, not as the result of inflation, but because of general distrust before inflation had occurred.

EFFECT OF UNCONVERTIBLE PAPER MONEY

I have been in two countries that suffered from inflation and the resort to unconvertible paper currency. I was in Germany in the autumn of 1923 when the German mark, which originally had been equivalent to 25 cents, had gradually fallen in value until it was not worth the cheapest kind of tissue paper.

The German Government had not begun with the idea of issuing paper money in vast amounts. They began with relatively small quantities. But as prices rapidly rose wages lagged far behind, and the people did not have enough money to meet the new price level; they ignorantly clamored for larger and larger issues. Then, as the Government issued more and more paper money, prices rose higher and higher, and it became more and more difficult for the people to purchase anything and the Government tried to meet the difficulty by issuing still more money. When I was there, in October, 1923, a man who received any money had to spend it within a few hours or he would find that prices had risen in the meanwhile to double what they were before. The farmers naturally refused to sell their grain or their meat or their vegetables or milk or eggs or chickens, and the people in the towns or cities were almost without food.

If I may narrate a personal incident, I went into a bank in Dusseldorf to buy some German money, not to spend it but for the momentary feeling of opulence that it gave me, and to keep as an example of what happens to a country which resorts to inconvertible paper money. I put down $10 and got for it something like 10,000,000,000 marks, the equivalent under normal rates of exchange of more than $2,000,000,000. I invited the rather haggard bank clerk to have lunch with me and asked him to explain how it had affected him. He told me that he was not able to have meat more than once in two weeks, but while his wages were increased every fortnight, they were fixed two weeks in advance, and that by the time he was paid the wages which were promised two weeks before, they would scarcely buy anything at all.

The result of all that inflation and all of that terrible experience in Germany was this: The working people, who had gradually through the years lifted their wages to where they offered a decent standard of living, found that the value of those wages was completely wiped out and they had to start at the bottom again.

What did it mean to the veterans? It meant that those veterans who were getting pensions and compensations for disabilities of one kind or another found that all that they had achieved during the preceding four or five years in the way of relief from their Government was worthless and they too had to start all over again.

The same thing happened in France. I was in France in 1926, and as I have a good many friends among those veterans whom I met in the war, I was able to learn what had befallen them in consequence of inflation and depreciation. The franc had dwin-died in value through inflation from a value of 20 cents to a value of 4 cents and all of their pensions and everything that they by effort and pressure had been able to induce their Government to provide for them had been cut down to the extent of four-fifths of their value.

If that were to happen in this country, and I believe it might happen if this bill were passed, it would do incalculable harm to every wage earner in the country, and to every man who has a salary. It would do incalculable harm to everyone who has insurance, or who has deposits in savings banks. It would do incalculable harm to the veterans themselves, because whatever they have won in the way of promises from the Government for compensation, for disability allowances, or for retirement allowances, would be diminished in value and might be completely wiped out.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes.

Mr. ESLICK. In case the $2,400,000,000 were paid, in accordance with the Patman bill, and the money in that amount were issued, does the gentleman think that that would create an inflation comparable to the German inflation and the French inflation?

Mr. ANDREW. No; not necessarily. I did not mean to say that that would inevitably result, but I think it would take us off the gold standard. I think if it were adopted that vast numbers of people would withdraw gold or gold certificates from the banks, and the banks would fail, and that Europeans who have hundreds of millions of dollars in this country would withdraw their gold, and that the Treasury would fail, and that we should be left upon an inconvertible paper standard, dependent only upon the will of congressional majorities. In that event I fear that the temptation would be almost irresistible under existing circumstances to issue more money to help the unemployed, to balance the Budget, to build roads, to lend money to impoverished cities and States, and so on. It is the easiest way for a government to pay its bills, and it is a very tempting way to meet extravagant appropriations. That is why I fear, the step once taken, if it drove us off the gold standard, would plunge us on a career that might lead anywhere.

Mr. ESLICK. If it were to stop at this issue, it would only produce a reasonable rise in other values, in agricultural and industrial values, would it not?

Mr. ANDREW. I can not believe that it could happen without causing the failure of banks or without inducing European people to withdraw their money. They have felt that the standard of monetary stability in the United States was higher than anywhere else in the world, and they have lots of money, hundreds of millions of dollars, invested here or on balance. If they drew that back, we would pass off the gold standard, and after that no one can say what might follow.

Mr. ESLICK. Let me ask you one other question. With an estimated wealth of $250,000,000,000 and an indebtedness of $150,000,000,000 public and private in this country, what hope is there to pay these debts unless there is a material increase in circulation?

Mr. ANDREW. Now, if I may answer that as I see it—and I do not claim to be the final seat of authority on anything——

Mr. ESLICK. I take it it is more or less guesswork with all of us.

CAN PRICES BE RAISED?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes. But I will try to answer it as I see it. Professor Kemmerer, if you were here yesterday, explained quite clearly what is the generally accepted theory of the level of prices, how in our country the purchasing power which influences prices, is only in a very small proportion (he said about 10 per cent) in the form of currency and about 90 per cent in the form of credit or checking accounts. Most payments are made to-day by checks, in the United States, and in all the English-speaking countries. The price level depends primarily upon the rapidity with which these checking accounts revolve, upon their velocity of circulation.

I think the way to restore the price level in this country is to restore confidence, so that checking accounts and money will circulate again with the rapidity with which they used to circulate. The checking accounts of the banks, which influence prices in the same way as actual currency, used to circulate three years ago about seventy-eight times in a year. To-day they circulate at the rate of only about forty times in a year.

Now, the way to restore the price level, in my judgment, is to let confidence and hope recuperate, and not to disturb it. Then our people will begin to buy again, and checking accounts and money will function with their old-time velocity, and prices will tend to go back to their old level.

Mr. ESLICK. We have the same money standards that we had three years ago in this country.

Mr. ANDREW. Yes; exactly.

Mr. ESLICK. Now, there has been a perpetual loss of confidence.

Mr. ANDREW. No; I should rather say that it is a temporary disease.

Mr. ESLICK. What are you going to do to cure that disease with the present standards without adding some new blood or some new methods?

Mr. ANDREW. I should say that the way to treat a nervous disease is to let the patient rest quietly, and not try too many artificial stimulants. We have gotten into a morbidly sensitive and melancholic condition—all our people. They do not see things as they are. They are unduly apprehensive of the future. If you issue more fiduciary money, you only increase the fright, and if you scare people more, you make things worse.

Mr. ESLICK. Gold is the standard, is it not?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes.

Mr. ESLICK. Do you agree with Doctor Kemmerer that if the amount of gold in the world to-day could be doubled, it would be a detriment to the people rather than an aid?

Mr. ANDREW. No; I do not. I do not say it would be a detriment or an aid. It would benefit some and harm others.

Mr. ESLICK. If the people of this country or the world had $2 of gold to take the place of one, and gold is the standard, would not that necessarily aid the commerce of the world?

Mr. ANDREW. I think it would give something in the nature of a fillip to business throughout the world if that happened. But I can not feel the same way about a currency dependent in its amount upon the will of Congress. I would not disparage Congress, being a Member of it. But I do not believe that you could reestablish trust in the business world if the currency system and the amount of money in the country were left to the will of political majorities, because you have so many persistent appeals for help, first from one group and then from another. If Congress could easily provide financial assistance for one group or the other group, by simply printing paper money, we might too often yield to the temptation.

Mr. ESLICK. May I ask you what you define as fiduciary money?

Mr. ANDREW. I mean money that is not gold, that could not command in the market the value of gold except as it is redeemable in gold. I mean United States notes and Federal reserve notes and silver certificates and silver or copper coins.

Mr. ESLICK. In other words, it is not measured by gold.

Mr. ANDREW. Its substance has not the value of gold.

Mr. VINSON. Would you call national-bank notes fiduciary money?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes, surely.

Mr. DICKINSON. To what do you attribute the want of confidence in the United States? What brought about this want of confidence, in your judgment?

CAUSES OF THE PANIC

Mr. ANDREW. It seems to have been a reaction from a period of tremendous overoptimism and overexpansion in every field, not merely speculation in the stock market. Everybody three or four years ago was banking too much on the future, was buying not only from current earnings but from those expected or hoped for. The whole installment plan of buying was based on that. Women bought fur coats and jewelry expecting to pay for them two or three years hence Men built houses and bought automobiles and electric refrigerators and radios and everything else, not with what they had but with what they hoped to have. Cities and States, factories and firms of all sorts, mortgaged their future. They went too far and borrowed too much from the future and finally the bubble burst.

Mr. DICKINSON. Due in part to this speculation in stocks and the resultant crash—Professor Kemmerer thought that it was largely due to that.

Mr. ANDREW. I think that was one very influential factor, but the speculation was not only in securities. People were speculating in almost everything, thinking that they would have the income next year or the year following to pay for them; they speculated in real-estate developments, in houses, hotels, store buildings, factories, as well as in automobiles or personal luxuries.

Mr. LEWIS. Professor Kemmerer yesterday referred to the fact that the number of shares of stock on the New York Stock Exchange had jumped from 171,000,000 to 1,125,000,000 in the few years preceding this financial break. Would you call that fiatism in industry?

Mr. ANDREW. To an extreme degree. I do not like to say it, lest I be misunderstood or misquoted, but I think the big banking houses, affiliates, and brokers who were floating securities, both domestic and foreign, at inflated values were probably more responsible than anybody else in this country for the situation that exists to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. Fiatism then in private industry and private capital may be as dangerous as fiatism of the Government?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes. Our recent history proves it.

CHANGES IN CURRENCY SUPPLY

Mr. VINSON. I have listened very attentively to your idea about the insertion of new currency into our system. What would be your notion if the currency were contracted—fiduciary currency—at this time?

Mr. ANDREW. Were contracted?

Mr. VINSON. Yes. If it were withdrawn from circulation. You say it would be harmful to add any fiduciary currency to the system. Now, what would happen or what would be the effect if you withdrew fiduciary currency?

Mr. ANDREW. You mean by Government vote?

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREW. I think it would be unfortunate. I think the less the Government has to do with the quantity of currency in a country the better it is for the country.

Mr. VINSON. Who is going to have anything to do with it, Mr. ANDREW, if the Government does not manage it?

Mr. ANDREW. We have an organized banking system which was established by Congress, and one of its purposes was to make our currency responsive to the needs of business. It works more or less automatically. It is dependent to some extent upon the production and distribution of gold in the world, and to some extent upon the men who administer the banking system. It has not worked successfully all the time, but I should rather leave it as it is, than subject it to the changing will of political majorities. I do not mean political in the sense of Republican or Democrat.

Mr. VINSON. Most of us when we are sick look for a doctor?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes. Most people do.

Mr. VINSON. We do not like to let nature take its course. What we, as Members of Congress, including yourself, are trying to do is to find a prescription.

Mr. ANDREW. Yes; I wish that we might, but sometimes nature in her own quiet way overcomes disease more effectively than medicine.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. ANDREW, what is your personal view with respect to the cessation of the interest charge upon loans made to veterans?

REASONABLE CHANGES IN BONUS LAW

Mr. ANDREW. I think there ought to be some adjustment made. I have not studied it carefully enough to know just exactly what. I feel that the Government should not charge the veteran for his borrowings more than it has itself to pay for the money which it borrows on similar long-time loans. But I should not want to make it more profitable for the veteran to borrow than to hold on to his insurance.

I have talked in a very rambling way here, but I did want to say after Mr. LEA spoke this morning, that I agree with him in the feeling that the Government does not now owe to the veterans interest for the next 13 years on their certificates; that it is not exact to say, as many of the veterans have come to feel, that the Government owes them the interest for the next 13 years.

I will say in that connection, if a system can be worked out along the lines as suggested by Mr. LEA this morning, by which an option could be given to the veterans allowing them to receive in cash the original service basis of their certificates, plus the 25 per cent which was allotted for the period between the time they left the Army or the Navy and the date when the bonus certificates were issued, plus the compound interest up to the present time—I should favor allowing them the option of a final settlement in cash upon this basis.

Mr. VINSON. At what date would you compute it at compound interest?

Mr. ANDREW. Just as it is in the certificate to-day.

Mr. VINSON. The date of the issuance of the certificate?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes; because we added 25 per cent, which was approximately compound interest at 4 per cent, for the preceding years.

Mr. VINSON. There is some controvery as to just why that 25 per cent was added. I was not a member of the committee at that time, but some seem to think that it was added in order to compensate for the delay in securing the face value of the certificates.

Mr. ANDREW. I can not remember the motives of everybody at that time. It has been my understanding in the intervening years as I have stated it, but at any rate in actual fact it does do that very thing. It adds about 4 per cent compounded for five years, approximately.

CONGRESS AND THE VETERANS

As to the proposal before us to-day—for the immediate prepayment of future interest on the bonus certificates—if Congress does not indorse it, and I do not see how we can, ex-service men and their families should not feel that we are treating them ungenerously. It will simply mean that Congress has a more thoughtful comprehension of the real interests of the veterans and of the country as a whole than some of the veterans have themselves. They must also remember that our National Government is already spending more than a third of all the taxes it collects, or more than a billion dollars a year, for veteran relief. Congress is appropriating during the present year for the benefit only of those connected with the World War no less than eight hundred seventy millions, or an average of nearly $200 for every one of the more than 4,000,000 men who at one date or another enlisted in that war, and this takes no account of the loans extended to these veterans upon their certificates. The Nation has rightly shown and will continue to show its gratitude for the inestimable service rendered by these men in 1917–18. The vast majority of ex-service men appreciate this fact, and I am sure that they would not want us to accede to any proposal which they might make if in our earnest judgment it could not be granted without harm or peril to the country.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the naval bill and all amendments to final passage. The question the Chair desires to propound now is whether a separate vote is demanded on any amendment?

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on what is known as the Darrow amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Darrow amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, after line 4, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"Naval Hospital, Philadelphia, Pa.: To continue construction of the public works authorized by the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works at Philadelphia, Pa., and for other purposes,' approved February 12, 1931 (46 Stat. 1091), subject to the limit of cost fixed by such act, $1,000,000."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it has been some five or six days since the amendment was offered, I think it is nothing more than fair and just to the membership of the House that there be a little further explanation of the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that there may be 10 minutes of debate, 5 minutes on each side, in which to offer an explanation of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that there may be 10 minutes' debate on the subject of the Darrow amendment, 5 minutes to be controlled by himself and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment involves a direct appropriation of $1,000,000 from the Treasury to begin construction of a naval hospital at Philadelphia, which will ultimately cost $3,000,000. If personal considerations weighed with me, I probably would not protest, because of my personal friendship for its author, but this is no time to begin new construction, especially when the Chief of Operations of the Navy Department says it is not necessary. This is no time to begin obligating the Government to new expenditures when we spent all day yesterday and all of the evening session last night considering how we could save some money for the Treasury and the people of the United States.

I simply desire to call the attention of the Members of this House to just what they are being asked to vote upon here, and that is a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for a purpose that the Chief of Operations of the Navy Department says is not necessary or needed at this time.

The adoption of this amendment, I wish every Member to understand, will add $1,000,000 to the naval appropriation bill as reported out of the committee and will impose an extra demand to that extent upon the Federal Treasury next year and an additional $2,000,000 in the succeeding year or two.

When asked about the need for this hospital, the Chief of Naval Operations stated to the naval subcommittee:

I never wanted to build it myself. I have been fighting against it. I have been absolutely opposed to that.

And the members of the subcommittee will bear me out in the statement that the Secretary of the Navy indorsed the position of his chief naval adviser.

I admit this project has Budget support; but why? The item was omitted from the original Budget. Not until we were ready to write the naval bill did the recommendation come down. We had then passed a tax bill designed to aid in rehabilitating the Treasury; we had, after much study, reduced many of the appropriation bills to the utmost, and we were then engaged in endeavoring through the Economy Committee to find other ways in which to save, and in the face of all this and after all this the recommendation comes down, and it came down contrary to the Budget policy of refusing all appropriations for initiating new projects.

Mr. Speaker, there is hardly a man on this floor who has not been discriminated against by this exception to the general policy, which extended not alone to new projects but in many instances to continuing projects under way.

The Navy does not need this hospital at Philadelphia. If the Veterans' Administration needs a hospital in Philadelphia or in that general vicinity, then let us provide for it under the Veterans' Administration. It is not a proper naval expense.

And let me remind you that while the existing hospital at Philadelphia is of temporary construction, that we are at this time also housing patients in temporary hospitals at Annapolis, Md., Chelsea, Mass., Great Lakes, Ill., Norfolk, Va., Mare Island, Calif., Harris Island, S. C., Puget Sound, Wash., and Portsmouth, N. H. It is equally as desirable to house patients in the temporary hospitals at those places as at Philadelphia.

We did not relieve the situation when we had a balanced Budget. Why wait until to-day to begin, and why begin at Philadelphia, particularly when counseled against by the Navy Department? I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Gentlemen, if we are going to begin new activities, whether they be at Philadelphia or elsewhere, under present circumstances, there is no telling where we may end; and let us not put ourselves in the inconsistent position of sitting here all day yesterday and the balance of to-day and possibly to-morrow in an effort to save a little money for the people of the United States and at the same time appropriate $1,000,000 for some new construction which the Navy Department states is not needed. [Applause.]

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Tennessee says that we have not commenced any new construction. Do I not recall that we passed a bill of $132,500,000 for road construction? However, the need for this appropriation is an emergent one. The Director of the Budget in sending his supplemental estimate said the need for this proposed construction has developed since the transmission of the Budget for 1933 and that its approval is recommended.

The reason the supplemental estimate was made was because, after careful inspection made there in the early part of March by the Navy Department, it was found that these temporary buildings, which can not in any way be compared with those mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee, were so rapidly deteriorating that the sills were tumbling down, and Captain Dennis, of the Surgeon General's office, one of the naval officers who made the inspection, found that the patients when in the mess hall required umbrellas over them to keep them from getting wet. Not only was the roof leaking but the rain was driving through the sides and the buildings were about ready to tumble down.

The buildings that were enumerated at other places are of a much more permanent character. They are of as permanent a character as wood construction can be, while the buildings at Philadelphia are of flimsy construction and were built as an emergency during war times.

The danger of fire has greatly increased and should a fire start in one of these buildings the loss of life would be appalling, because the buildings are huddled close together and there would be little opportunity to save the patients.

This hospital takes care of the veterans as well as the Navy patients. There is no veterans' hospital for the care of this type of patients nearer than Hartford, Conn. It is a surgical and general hospital, and to compel these patients to occupy buildings of this character, both from the standpoint of their health and the danger of fire, seems to me not only a crime but a disgrace.

I submit that there are no buildings anywhere in the United States of such great emergency or comparable in any way to this situation, and the reason we are pleading for the appropriation at this time is because of the rapid deterioration and because everything seems to be on the point of tumbling down.

I hope the amendment will be sustained so that we will not subject these patients, both naval and veteran, to this great fire hazard, on account of which many of the patients may lose their lives. Let us give them a decent place in which to be housed.

This situation is not comparable in any way with the necessity for new buildings for other purposes. This is an acute emergency and the construction is urgently asked for by the American Legion and by all service men. I hope, my friends, you will support this amendment.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for half a minute on this naval question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is fair to the opposition. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DARROW) there were 111 ayes and 122 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COLLINS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 25, line 19, before the semicolon, insert "Provided further, That the total number of enlisted men in the ratings of bandmaster, first musician, musician first class, and musician second class on April 18, 1932, shall be reduced by 355 by discontinuing new enlistments and reenlistments not continuous in such ratings and/or placing in such ratings men otherwise rated."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, a point or order. My understanding is that action was taken on this question by an amendment passed in the House. That was stricken out by an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that is not a good point of order. The Speaker can not take cognizance of any action that has been taken in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union except as reported to the House. The chairman of the committee reports only the facts as to amendments, and there was no report that any part of the bill had been stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the motion to recommit attempts to reinsert language that was stricken out of the bill in the House by agreeing to an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole. The rulings are uniform that you can not undo in a motion to recommit that which the House has just disposed of, so the point of order is well taken.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back after further consideration with 10 per cent reduction in the total amount of the appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHAFER moves to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report it back after consideration with a 10 per cent reduction in the total appropriation.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were 20 ayes and 198 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. AYRES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 195, a privileged resolution, from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the bill H. R. 6662, with the amendment of the Senate thereto, be, and the same is hereby, taken from the Speaker's table to the end that the amendment of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, concurred in.

The Senate amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 336. Recommendations for adjustment of duties: (a) Upon the request of the President of the United States, or upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party showing good and sufficient reason therefor, the commission shall investigate and ascertain the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article, whether or not actually imported into the United States. If the commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duty imposed by law upon the foreign article does not equalize the differences in the cost of production of the domestic article and of the foreign article when produced in the principal competing country or countries, then the commission shall report to the President and to the Congress such increases or decreases in the duty upon the foreign article as the commission finds to be necessary in order to equalize such differences in the costs of production. Any such increased or decreased duty may include the transfer of the article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, a change in the form of duty, or a change in classification. The report shall be accompanied by a statement of the commission setting forth the findings of the commission with respect to the differences in cost of production, the elements of cost included in the cost of production of the respective articles as ascertained by the commission, and any other matter deemed pertinent by the commission.

"'The President, upon receipt of any such report of the commission, shall promptly transmit the report to the Congress with his recommendations, if any, with respect to the increase or decrease in duty proposed by the commission.

"'Any bill having for its object the carrying out, in whole or in part, of the recommendations made by the commission in any such report shall not include any item not included in such report; and in the consideration of such bill, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, no amendment thereto shall be considered which is not germane to the items included in such report.

"'(b) No report shall be made by the commission under this section unless the determination of the commission with respect thereto is reached after an investigation by the commission during the course of which the commission shall have held hearings and given reasonable public notice of such hearings, and reasonable opportunity for the parties interested to be present, produce evidence, and to be heard. The commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable rules of procedure as may be necessary to execute its functions under this section.

"'(c) In ascertaining the differences in costs of production under this section, the commission shall take into consideration, in so far as it finds them pertinent and practicable—

"'(1) The differences in conditions of production, including wages in terms of labor cost per unit of product, costs of materials, and other items in cost of production of like or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries;

"'(2) Costs of transportation;

"'(3) Other costs, including the cost of containers and coverings of whatever nature, and other charges and expenses incident to placing the article in condition, packed ready for delivery, storage costs in the principal market or markets of the United States and of the principal competing country or countries, and costs of reconditioning or repacking wherever incurred;

"'(4) Differences between the domestic and foreign article in packing and containers, and in condition in which received in the principal markets of the United States;

"'(5) Invoice prices or values and/or wholesale selling prices in the principal market or markets in the principal competing country or countries, in so far as such prices or values are indicative of costs of production, provided such costs can not be satisfactorily obtained;

"'(6) Advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country;

"'(7) Any other advantages or disadvantages in competition which increase or decrease in a definitely determinable amount the total cost at which domestic or foreign articles may be delivered in the principal market or markets of the United States; and

"'(8) Definition of costs of transportation: Costs of transportation for the purposes of this section shall be held to include, in so far as applicable, freight charges and all other charges incident to transportation, including transit insurance, costs of loading and unloading, and port charges and landing charges. These costs shall be computed from the principal producing areas (in the United States and in the principal competing country or countries) that can reasonably be expected to ship to the principal consuming region or regions of the United States and shall be computed to such principal market or markets of the United States as may most nearly insure equal competitive opportunity to domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles in such region or regions. If this purpose may be best accomplished thereby, such costs on domestic articles and on like or similar foreign articles shall be computed to different principal markets of the United States.

"'(d) In determining costs of production in the United States and in the principal competing country or countries for the purposes of this section, the commission shall take into consideration the costs of production only of such establishments as are economically located and efficiently operated, and shall obtain such costs for a normal and representative period.

"'(e) In connection with its investigations as to differences in costs of production the commission shall inquire into the following matters and shall include in each report pursuant to this section a summary of the facts with respect to such matters:

"'(1) The efficiency and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration;

"'(2) The conditions of such domestic industry with respect to profits and losses, the extent to which productive capacity is utilized, and the extent of unemployment;

"'(3) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be due to foreign competition or to other specified factors;

"'(4) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be remedied by adjustments in the tariff law, taking into consideration the substitution of articles used for the same purposes as the articles under consideration, and taking into consideration any other pertinent competitive factors; and

"'(5) The effects of any proposed increase or decrease in rates of duties on other domestic industries and on the export trade of the United States.'

"SEC. 2. All uncompleted investigations instituted prior to the approval of this act under section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 prior to its amendment by this act, including investigations in which the President has not proclaimed changes in classification or in basis of value or increases or decreases in rates of duty, shall be dismissed without prejudice; but the information and evidence secured by the commission in any such investigation may be given due consideration in any investigation instituted under the provisions of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 as amended by this act.

"SEC. 3. Consumers' counsel: (a) There shall be an office in the legislative branch of the Government to be known as the office of the consumers' counsel of the United States Tariff Commission. The office shall be in charge of a counsel to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No person shall be eligible for appointment as counsel if such person has at any time acted in tariff matters before Congress or the United States Tariff Commission, either on his own behalf or as attorney, at law or in fact, or as legislative agent. The counsel shall be appointed for a term of four years and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. The counsel shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as counsel.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the counsel to appear in the interest of and represent the consuming public in any proceeding before the commission. In any proceeding before the commission in which the counsel has entered an appearance the counsel shall have the right to offer any relevant testimony and argument, oral or written, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses and parties to the proceeding, and shall have the right to have subpœna or other process of the commission issue in his behalf. Whenever the counsel finds that it is in the interest of the consuming public to have the commission furnish any information at its command or conduct any investigation as to differences in costs of production or other matters within its authority, then the counsel shall so certify to the commission, specifying in the certificate the information or investigation desired. Thereupon the commission shall promptly furnish to the counsel the information or promptly conduct the investigation and place the results thereof at the disposal of the counsel.

"(c) Within the limitations of such appropriations as the Congress may from time to time provide, the counsel is authorized (subject to the civil service laws and the classification act of 1923, as amended) to appoint and fix the salaries of assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditures as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

"SEC. 4. International economic conference: That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an international economic conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars, and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations; but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence, or in any way affects the revenue of the United States, must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

"The President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested, at as early a date as may be convenient, to proceed to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions. Such agreements shall not become operative until Congress by law shall have approved them.

"SEC. 5. Maintenance of competition among domestic producers and distributors: In effectuating the purpose of a tariff policy to encourage domestic industries by the imposition of duties upon imports from other countries it is also the purpose to protect domestic purchasers and consumers against the exaction of excessive or artificial prices in respect to any and all the articles, commodities, and things subject to such duties by the maintenance of full conditions of unrestrained competition among domestic producers and distributors. In order to assure the maintenance of such conditions of competition any citizen of the United States or the consumers' counsel established in this act shall be entitled to file a complaint in the United States Customs Court alleging that such conditions of competition do not prevail with respect to the production, distribution, or sale of any such dutiable article or commodity and setting forth the facts and circumstances supporting the allegations in such complaint which shall be verified by the oath of the complainant or others.

"Upon the filing of such complaint the said United States Customs Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the truth and merit of such complaint and shall immediately cause public notice to be given by publication in the Treasury Decisions of the Department of the Treasury and the Commerce Reports of the Department of Commerce to all persons and corporations or associations concerned in the domestic production, distribution, or sale of such article that it will hold a hearing on the questions of fact and law contained in such complaint upon a day to be named therein when relevant testimony and argument may be offered to determine whether such full conditions of domestic competition prevail and to what extent if any price-fixing agreements or practices, or production-limiting agreements or practices, obtain in the production, distribution, or sale of such article or commodity; and following such testimony and hearing the said court shall report its findings to the President.

"Upon the receipt of such findings, if it be shown thereby that the full conditions of competition contemplated by this act do not prevail with respect to the dutiable article, commodity, or thing described in such complaint, then it shall be the duty of the President within one month to issue a proclamation suspending the imposition and collection of the duty or duties levied in this act upon such article, commodity, or thing and declaring such duty or duties inoperative until and unless it shall be established before such court, and such court shall make findings to the effect that the full conditions of competition aforesaid do prevail and shall report such findings to the President, who shall then proclaim a cessation of the suspension of such duty or duties.

"The said court shall be governed by the preponderance of the evidence in making its findings and shall have power to make reasonable rules and regulations to govern its procedure in such cases: Provided, That nothing herein and no proceeding brought hereunder shall be held to weaken or otherwise adversely affect the laws of the United States applicable to conspiracies in restraint of trade or the enforcement thereof."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] desire to enter into any arrangement about time?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman yield me 30 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL]. I now yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that my friends on the other side will have much to say about gag rule. I think I have demonstrated, so far as I am individually concerned, that I favor this House considering measures under the general rules of the House, with liberality of debate and liberality of amendment. The bill that this rule deals with, the tariff bill, was considered in the House under the general rules of the House, with no limitation as to amendment, and the House, after the fullest and freest consideration, passed the bill and sent it to the Senate. It is back with one amendment, which contains three minor changes. I think I demonstrated with the tax bill that I believe in freedom of debate and freedom of amendment, and my friends on the other side of the House criticized me and said that I should have brought in a rule to consider that bill, which I stated I would not do. In this instance it was my wish to have the House consider the Senate amendment under the general rules of the House and to that end I made a unanimous-consent request to this House two weeks ago that it be so considered the next day by unanimous consent under the general rules of the House. I advised my distinguished friend, the Republican leader, Mr. SNELL, that I was going to make that request that afternoon, so that he would be present. I did make the request, and when I did so Mr. SNELL asked me some questions. I stated to him that the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means had decided to move to concur in the Senate amendment, that the tariff is and ever will be a political question. I stated to him on the floor that if unanimous consent were not obtained to consider the bill under the general rules of the House, the alternative for me was to introduce a rule asking that the bill be considered and the Senate amendment concurred in. The gentleman from New York, clearly within his rights, objected to giving a consent order for the bill to be considered under the general rules of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to take the bill up and read it to-day?

Mr. CRISP. The adoption of this rule itself finishes the job. The adoption of the rule concurs in the Senate amendment and nothing else is left to be done. When my friend objected, I introduced a rule. I have just stated the effect of that rule. What is the situation, and what are you called upon to vote on?

The House passed this tariff bill, and, as we passed it, it contained a provision that when the Tariff Commission recommended, under the flexible clause, the lowering or raising of a rate, with the approval of the President, it was sent to Congress, and if, within 60 days, the Congress did not take action on the change recommended by the Tariff Commission, it became operative and effective and the law. The Senate amendment changes that by taking away that automatic power. The Senate amendment provides that when the Tariff Commission makes a report to change a rate and it is sent to Congress by the President it does not become a law until Congress takes affirmative action upon it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If I recall the incident, the matter the gentleman from Georgia is now discussing was put into the bill by way of an amendment put into the bill by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]?

Mr. CRISP. That is correct.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And the gentleman from Georgia at that time stated that he had had some conferences with gentlemen on this side and that he accepted the amendment?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman states it accurately. I did accept it and said so on the floor in open House. That, Mr. Speaker, is the fundamental change by the Senate amendment.

There are two other provisions—one that the President, as soon as convenient, shall enter into negotiations with the other nations of the world to negotiate tariff reciprocal trade arrangements, but it is also provided that before any of those agreements can take effect they must be approved by the Congress. The third and only other change made by the Senate is as to what is known as the Norris anti-monopoly amendment. That provides that where there has been built up a monopoly in this country on account of the tariff rates, any citizen or the consumers' counsel, can file a bill in the Customs Court and that court is to have a hearing upon it.

If that court determines it is a monopoly, then the President shall be notified and the President shall suspend all tariffs on those goods on which there is a monopoly until the monopoly ceases, and the customs court is the tribunal to determine after hearing when that monopoly ceases.

Those are the Senate changes. They are all incorporated in one amendment, and the adoption of this rule simply concurs in that amendment and sends the bill to the President for his approval or veto.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. HARE. After this petition is filed with the Customs Court, if that court finds a monopoly does exist, did I understand the gentleman to say that the President may suspend all tariffs on the particular goods in question?

Mr. CRISP. He shall suspend them.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. One of the changes the gentleman speaks of provides for this international conference. After this international conference has made a determination of what tariff rates are proper for America to adopt, then do the people of the United States have anything further to say about it, after our international friends have determined what is best for this country?

Mr. CRISP. I think all the rights of the American citizens are preserved. I will read the language to the gentleman:

The President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested, at as early a date as may be convenient to proceed to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions. Such agreements shall not become operative until Congress by law shall have approved them.

I think that answers the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, then, this international conference will determine what the tariff rates should be in the United States. Then, if Congress sees fit to approve what the international conference has done, we will have that privilege.

Mr. CRISP. Our negotiators, I think, are just as capable as those of the other countries in the world, and they will negotiate reciprocal, mutual tariff agreements. We will have just as much to say as to the tariffs of other countries as they have as to ours, but none of it is binding until our Congress has approved it,

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. In answer to the gentleman from Michigan, I would like to say that in the plain terms of the bill on page 16, the provision is placed as to what shall be the outcome after the conference has decided, beginning on line 14:

But with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence, or in any way affects the revenue of the United States, must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CRISP. I think that is the same thing that I quoted from another section. Both of them, before they are effective, must be approved by Congress.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. DALLINGER. Does the gentleman, from his long experience, know of a single case where a tariff bill has passed the House and been sent to the Senate and on its return from the Senate, not sent to conference?

Mr. CRISP. I can not answer the gentleman, but when we have determined to pass this bill and to assume all responsibility for it, it is futile to waste time and send it to conference.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman hopeful that the American Government will get a better deal on this League of Nations' tariff proposition than we got with the foreign nations with reference to their paying their honest debts to this badly battered Treasury of ours?

Mr. CRISP. I am as much disappointed as the gentleman from Wisconsin that they have not paid, and as far as I am concerned I will never by my vote here agree to reduce those debts in a settlement [applause], and I am opposed to any further moratoriums. I would hope we would have better luck, and if we did not, then Congress would not approve any reciprocal tariff agreement.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. TEMPLE. As I understand the language of the Senate amendment, when the negotiations with foreign countries have been completed and a treaty or agreement has been made Congress would have to ratify that treaty.

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then we change the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the Senate shall ratify treaties. We change the Constitution of the United States by an act of Congress.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; and the Constitution also says that all revenue measures shall originate in the House of Representatives, and we are preserving that constitutional right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The very first act upon which the distinguished Speaker and myself were called upon to act upon our election to Congress was the Cuban reciprocity pact. A treaty had been negotiated between our Government and Cuba affecting the revenues, but the thought of President Roosevelt and the best thought of Congress was that it should be ratified by the Congress. Congress was convened on November 9, 1903, for that special purpose, and the Cuban reciprocity pact was approved.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the greatest contributing factor to the economic condition of the world to-day is constituted by artificial trade barriers and tariff barriers that have interfered with the exchange of commerce between nation and nation. [Applause.] No nation can live to itself alone. If we do not buy from other nations, they do not have the exchange to buy from us. Since we passed our last tariff bill high reciprocal tariffs have been enacted by other countries of the world, which makes a complicated situation for us, independently, to change our tariff rates. The sensible, the wise, the practical way is to have an international conference with the other nations of the world and see if common sense and reason can not prevail and those artificial trade barriers be adjusted so that each nation can fairly and legitimately do business with each other nation, at the same time protecting the rights of its own citizens as to labor costs. That and that only is what this bill does.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, for a pure, unadulterated, No. 1 example of Democratic gag rule, this is the best that was ever written. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will a little later.

And, when it is backed up by the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, that when the Democratic majority made up its mind to pass anything, it is futile to discuss it or debate it, that adds insult to injury, over anything that has ever happened before in this House.

I thought I knew something about preparing rules. I have brought in some here for which I have received some brickbats from the Democratic side of this House.

But if I ever brought one in here that provided that a bill should be passed without being read or discussed, or a single thing said about it, I want to apologize now. [Laughter.] I want to know what the liberal men on the Democratic side of the House are going to do with this resolution? I mean the men who have always so bitterly criticized every Republican rule ever presented. And the best part of it all is that the author of this rule is the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the real Democratic father of rules liberalization.

We have had several debates on the floor of this House during the last three or four years about liberalization of the rules of the House. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and I have not always been on the same side. How many times, even within the last month, I have heard him make the statement that he believed in full, free, and impartial discussion on the part of every Member on every bill that was brought before the House. I have seen him stand here and heard him say: "I have bared my breast to all the shafts during the debate on this bill. I want every man to freely and fully discuss this bill, and I believe in the fullest right of discussion in all matters pertaining to legislation."

Just what has happened in the last two or three weeks that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has turned such a complete somersault?

Why, the distinguished Speaker of the House just a few days ago came down to the floor and said: "Some of you took exception because I would not bring this bill here under a closed rule. I am opposed to closed rules." He ran up and down the aisle here and said: "I want free and open discussion on everything; that is what the Democrats stand for." [Laughter and applause.] Oh, how the mighty have fallen!

During all the years that we Republicans were bringing in rules here some of them were fairly drastic, but never anything as bad as this. Some of the younger Members on our own side of the House had begun to believe, after they had heard the distinguished gentleman from Georgia and a number of the other leading Democrats talk about the liberality, the generosity, and the fairness of the Democratic Party, that perhaps we Republicans were too strict. Why, they even thought that some of the Democrats even meant what they said. But now we have an absolute and perfect example of what you fellows do when you get the power. [Laughter.] There will be no more trouble from the Members on our side.

Mr. CRISP. I am just wondering if my friend is perhaps a little bit jealous of the fact that we have found a quick and short way to do things.

Mr. SNELL. There is no quicker, shorter way than you have here.

Mr. CRISP. I agree with you. [Laughter.] When I attempt to do anything I do a good job. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Georgia has turned such a complete somersault that I am apologizing for him; that is all.

Mr. CRISP. I gave my good friend an opportunity to have this bill brought up under the general rules of the House, with no limitation as to debate or amendment, and my distinguished friend from New York himself prevented it.

Mr. SNELL. I will tell you why. Normally the bill should go to conference, and the gentleman knows it. That is the logical, normal way that we have always handled these bills, and I told you at that time I would not object to sending it to conference.

Mr. CRISP. Why should it go to conference when we are going to agree to the amendment?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] two additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. It is not very often that my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is inconsistent. I have the very greatest respect for the gentleman from North Carolina, and I have also for the gentleman from Georgia, as far as that is concerned. I am just sorry for them; I am sorry for what they are doing here to-day. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] said yesterday, and I heard him say it, and he said it with a trembling voice and with much emotion, and I think he really meant it:

> I say no nation except a nation of hogs would repudiate such obligation. If they do repudiate it, I, for one, shall always be opposed hereafter to sending any American to sit in at any of their hypocritical, scheming conferences called for any purpose.

[Applause.]

Within one hour my good friend from North Carolina introduced this rule, which provides for sending men to Europe to negotiate in an international conference, and not even to consider foreign affairs but to consider domestic policies. If there is any inconsistency conceivable to the mind of man that has not been brought out, as far as the Democratic Party is concerned, in connection with this rule, I would like somebody to tell me what it is. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this legislation impeaches the ability of the American people to manage their own affairs. For a long period of years using our own wisdom we have grown in strength, in numbers, in wealth, and in all social advantages, so that under normal conditions our labor is paid the highest wages in the world, and our people have the best standard of living in the world. The pending bill is not an emergency measure. It contains the plan our Democratic opponents propose as a permanent policy.

This bill proposes that on matters we have heretofore regarded as peculiarly for us to decide, including import duties, competing nations are to have a voice in determining what conditions we should impose upon imports, how we should protect our labor, how we should provide for the development of our own industries. These involve the fundamentals of American civilization.

If this bill becomes a law and the policy it proposes is put into effect, then we will have tariff treaties with 50 or 60 nations of the world, and every session that the Congress holds for years to come will deal with the tariff question, and no industry, no development in this country, will be certain of the conditions under which it will operate.

In this bill our Democratic friends indicate that they are unable of their own wisdom to conduct the trade relations of this great country, but must invite competing nations to advise with them. It substitutes foreign interested advice for the nonpartisan consideration of rates by the Tariff Commission, for the Tariff Commission not only considers revisions of rates in the interest of tariff revenues, but when tariff bills are under consideration, the commission supplies valuable information by carefully considered reports and through its trained personnel. This bill practically nullifies the flexible provisions of the tariff.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Under this bill how shall we exclude Russian timber products?

Mr. HAWLEY. We can not do it. We have no treaty with Russia; we have no relations with Russia.

The bill provides expressly that no treaty shall be effective until approved by Congress in the form of legislation.

That emphasizes the statement I just made, that every session of Congress will be dealing with this question that intimately and necessarily affects our agriculture, labor, industry, trade, and commerce. Treaties will be made with nations that are growing agricultural products, and at one time we will have an agricultural tariff before the House; at another time we will be dealing with nations that are industrial in character and we will have an industrial tariff under consideration. The adjustment of the tariff duties between all the varying activities in the United States is important so that protection given in one instance shall not prove disadvantageous to others. How can this be effected under the proposed bill?

Let me picture the situation. Negotiations will be had, either in the League of Nations, where there may be a general meeting, or with individual countries. If any scientific tariff provisions are to be effected it will be necessary to reveal the intimate conditions of American production and labor in order to reach an agreement for any particular duty upon any particular item. Do we wish to lay before the governments of Europe or their representatives the industrial processes of our manufacturers and the measures we have adopted for the development of our country, and have them pass judgment on them; have them counsel us in these matters? These negotiations will stir up controversies with every country in the world, sooner or later, and result in endless dissensions.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HAWLEY. No country has a right to import goods into this country. It is a privilege; but this bill says to other nations, "We will ask you what the nature of that privilege should be, its extent, its conditions, and what rates of duties we ought to impose." Our tariff acts are general in character, levied without discrimination against any country. We will surrender that necessary control over our own affairs which is essential to the continuance and upbuilding of this country.

Shall we supplant this impartial system by a series of individual tariffs, necessarily involving inequalities, in the opinions of other nations?

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to ask, for information, whether we did not have a treaty or reciprocity with Canada?

Mr. HAWLEY. We have attempted that, but it has not proven a satisfactory method. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, my friend, the former chairman of the Committee on Rules, the distinguished gentleman from New York, seemed to get a considerable amount of amusement out of his presentation of what he calls the inconsistencies of the gentleman from Georgia and the Speaker of the House, as well as of the Committee on Rules, in presenting this proposition.

From time to time we hear a great deal said here on the floor of the House about the activities of the Committee on Rules in bringing in so-called gag rules. Well, gentlemen, I am taking advantage of this opportunity—although I did not expect to participate in this debate—to restate, as I have done heretofore on one or two occasions, what I conceive to be the legitimate functions of the Committee on Rules. It is by its very nature a political or policy committee. Say what you please, in its last analysis that is what it is set up for and that is what it is expected, under our system of party government, to do.

I am not one of those who has to make any apology on the question of the so-called matter of the liberalization of the rules. I have been here long enough, gentlemen, to say in all candor to you that where a party is charged with the responsibility of government—with which the party in the majority in this House is supposed to be charged—it sometimes becomes absolutely necessary under the very mechanics of our legislative system to resort to the power with which the Committee on Rules is clothed of bringing in the order of business. As far as I am concerned, in this particular case, with reference to this rule, I have no apology whatever to make. I frankly admit it is a short, direct, and strong-armed method, if you want to call it that, of getting a vote upon this particular proposition, which the objection of the gentleman from New York made necessary, in order to register the will of the House as to whether or not we should adopt the Senate amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SNELL. The only suggestion I have to make is that we ought to do this at a night session when we can not see it as long as we are not to hear it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Speaking of night sessions, of course, does not throw any light upon the intelligence of this debate, as I see it.

There is the whole proposition, gentlemen. We are getting along in this session.

The party leadership on the majority side, as I understand it, is trying very definitely and very earnestly to get through the legislative program of the House, in its essential features, so we may adjourn this Congress not later than the 10th day of June. [Applause.] Our calendar is congested. We have bills here of a really controversial nature which ought to go to conference, but here, and I will frankly admit it, there is involved very largely a political issue. The Democratic Party is in favor of this tariff proposition and has so registered its vote.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I will not yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, because I fear he will undertake to bring in the proposition of beer or some other matter which has no relation to this controversy.

Now, gentlemen, as practical legislators, and if you are willing to accept my theory of party responsibility and of the power and purpose of the Rules Committee, I say to you the thing to do is to get this proposition disposed of and disposed of quickly. What advantage would there be in sending the bill to conference? It would come back here just like the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] brings it back here for a vote on the proposition of agreeing to the Senate amendments. Therefore, why should this great furor be made here by the distinguished gentleman from New York on this question of a gag rule?

You know all that we Democrats ever learned about gag rules originated in the brains of the Republican Party, going back to Tom Reed and Uncle Joe Cannon and that long line of legislative tyrants, and I speak with respect. We learned all we ever knew from them, and as my friend BLANTON says, from Phil Campbell and men of that sort. So being a party that is anxious to absorb, if it can, some knowledge of practical politics, and I frankly confess this is a matter of practical politics and of practical legislation, we say to you that here you have a chance to vote on the essential proposition, take it or leave it. That is all there is in this rule.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman says he has learned from experience that this is the best thing to do, and that the gentleman and his party learned that from the Republicans; has the fact that heretofore, as a party, when you have been in power you have been able to caucus and bind your members, and the further fact that you have insurgency now and can not bind your members, had anything to do with your change of policy?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman speaks of insurgency; he will not find any insurgency on this side on the tariff proposition.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, sufficient reference has been made to the gag-rule proposition by the distinguished minority leader, with an attempt to reply by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], but if there ever was "gaggism" pure and simple, we are having a demonstration of it to-day. The gentleman from Alabama has referred to Uncle Joe Cannon and Tom Reed. Those two sainted men would turn over in their graves at such a gag rule brought before the House they presided over as the Democratic Party is giving us here to-day. This rule "outgags" gag rule and legislates besides. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] innocently asked if the merits of this measure were going to be discussed or the bill read, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] frankly told him, "No; we as Democrats are going to vote this thing through, and that ends it."

But the vote and adoption of the rule will not end it, gentlemen. For one reason, I approve of your rapidity of motion here to-day. Get it down to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue just as quickly as you can, because it will come back with the stiffest veto that any of you gentlemen ever read, and then let us see you pass it over that veto. You have not got the votes and you can not do it, and you do not deserve to have the votes, because there is no merit in the legislation you are proposing here. [Applause.]

Talk about discussing the merits of this measure in the half hour that each side has here. How ridiculous. The bill you are asking to have passed without reading and without debate was adversely acted upon by the Senate Finance Committee and was substituted upon the floor. The entire procedure is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution as the House, not the Senate, is authorized to originate legislation affecting our finances. You are trying to develop some political bunk out of pretending that you are trying to overcome the merits of the flexible provision of the tariff act. That is all there is in this measure, and you will not get anywhere in this effort, because the strong arm of the President of the United States will stand between your foolishness and the meritorious measure that is now on the statute books. Therefore, I think, perhaps we will give the gentleman from Georgia and his so-called broad-minded colleagues some credit. We want this measure sent to the White House just as soon as you men by your votes can get it there. We will stand against you to the last ditch, because it is not an American bill. It is not American doctrine to divide the responsibility of the employment of American citizens with a European bunch of conferees.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I can not yield, because the gentleman from Texas does not yield until he gets through with his statements, and that is what I am going to do with the four minutes I have now.

This is the situation, Mr. Speaker, and nothing else. We will be glad, as the Republican Representatives in this Congress, to meet you gentlemen on this issue within a very few months, just as soon as the Chicago conventions are over. We will be glad to take up with you the merits of this bill which not a one of you knows the first thing about and which, until this morning, you could not find. I tried all day yesterday to get a copy of this substitute bill, but it was not available. If that is the way the Democratic Party wants to appeal to the country with respect to their method of doing business, we will be glad to meet you on that issue. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to know just what has happened on the Democratic side since this bill was originally passed in the House. The original proposition by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee did exactly what the Senate substitute does with reference to the effect of the flexible provisions of the tariff. It killed those provisions and made them inoperative, except as to the making of reports to the President and to the Congress.

When the bill was before the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], representing a group from both sides of the Chamber, offered an amendment under which a decision of the Tariff Commission would become effective in 60 days, if not rejected by Congress. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. Now the Senate has taken out that provision, and the gentleman from Georgia says we must vote on the Senate amendment in the House without sending it to conference or even considering it under the general rules of the House. When he did offer to take up the Senate amendment in the House, without a conference, his party probably had not sufficiently ironed out their differences so that they could be certain of putting their plans through. Now they come in and say you must take the Senate proposal or leave it.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Illinois is not quite accurate. When I made the suggestion our differences were all adjusted. I knew that we could pass it. I then immediately dropped the present rule in the basket.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman wanted to proceed in the manner he first suggested, he could have dropped such a rule in the basket. He did not propose to do that. I think he rather welcomed the objection. I think he had in mind to do it this way, as this is the only way in which the majority can make all their Members willing to swallow the proposition.

The result of this act will be that hereafter the Tariff Commission will be spending appropriations making reports to the President and the Congress, and no action will be taken, because you know Congress will not at every session take up a tariff bill.

Now, further on in the bill you attempt to set aside the rules of the House and the Senate by providing that no amendment shall be offered to a bill which may be based on a report of the Tariff Commission, to say nothing about the provision to set aside the treaty-making power of the Senate of the United States. Go to it! [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I have had recent occasion to make a study of the power on the part of the House in treaty making. If this bill should get by the President's veto, and in my judgment there is not the remotest chance thereof, I do not believe it could get by the Supreme Court. The provision that treaties shall be passed upon by Congress would, in my judgment, be contrary to the provision of the Constitution that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The right of the House to have any share in the matter was first brought up by President Washington in 1796, when he refused the request of the House for certain papers relating to a treaty.

After a long discussion the House agreed to a resolution in the course of which it said:

> The House of Representatives do not lay claim to any agency in making treaties.

It went on to say, in substance, that if a treaty required a law to give it effect, the House should share. Since then more than this has been repeatedly claimed for the House on the ground that both the Constitution, with the laws of the United States and treaties shall be the supreme law of the land; and also that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. The conflict thus thought by some to be presented has produced many hours of discussion in each branch, and learned commentators have argued the question lengthily and vigorously. Committees of the House and even the House itself have asserted what at the moment was held to be its prerogative in the matter of treaties affecting customs duties. Nevertheless, the issue has never been brought to conclusion. After such study as I have been able to give to the question, my own judgment is that the Supreme Court would not sanction such power as this bill intends to give to the House.

There is, however, no doubt that the House is to share in legislation necessary to give a treaty effect. Whether the House is morally bound to pass such legislation is another question.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER].

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, about all I can do in this minute is to register a protest against this free-trade gesture contained in this bill. It is reported that Nero did some fiddling while Rome was burned. I say to my free-trade friends that they are fiddling while American industry is facing disaster. With the copper industry down and out, with the oil industry down and out, with the manganese industry down and out, with the pulpwood and lumber products industry in this country facing a situation which it has never faced before, with importations from Soviet Russia and foreign countries flooding our markets—instead of considering this free-trade gesture you ought to take a leaf from Canada's book and put an embargo on that sort of stuff. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time—eight minutes—to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, once more we are in the graveyard of Democratic hopes, erecting a monument, a graystone monument to the memory as the "weasel tariff bill." The name plate on the casket was "Mr. Political Expediency." The epitaph on the base of the monument is indicative of the "shifting-sands" policy of my Democratic friends. It reads—

> Oh, protection, how we loved you—in 1928,
> But fickle minds and prejudice have changed our love to hate.

[Laughter.]

Of course, you are just going backward—not in the same spirit that Edward Bellamy was looking backward, but you are going back 15 years to No. III of the Wilson 14 points, which decided to demand the removal of economic barriers—just a journey back down the trail. That is the history of the Democratic Party as regards the tariff; never looking forward and rejoicing, always looking back and regretting. Do you remember the Wilson bill, which you wrote in the nineties? You then wrote a bill presumably for revenue only, but before they had ever completed the bill they found it did not supply the necessary revenue within $75,000,000, and what did you do? You added an income-tax rider to the bill that was afterwards declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

This rider you added to provide that $75,000,000 which you were incapable of providing by tariff rates in the bill that you then prepared. It has been that way all through the intervening years, you have been most unfortunate in your attempts to write tariff legislation. Then came the Underwood bill, that would have brought the country into just as bad a condition as we are in to-day, if it had not been for the World War. The war came upon us and saved the skin of the Democratic Party. It made everybody in the world dependent upon us for production. The manpower of the European nations was out on the field of battle, and we were supplying everything they needed from foodstuffs to textiles and war materials. And that is all that saved you in 1914, a year after the enactment of your so-called Underwood-Simmons bill, which the author said had no protection in it, not an ounce, and when he was challenged as to that statement he said that whatever protection it contained was "merely incidental."

Imagine our representatives from this country—the representatives of labor, of our textile manufacturers, of your shoe men, Mr. CONNERY, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and your oil men, Mr. RAGON, the gentleman from Arkansas, sitting in a conference with a Fiji Islander, a Hotentot, an Australian, and a Japanese, and everybody's representative in the world trying to come to some sort of conclusion as to American tariff rates. [Laughter.] There is no provision for interpreters when as a matter of fact for such an international conference you have to have about 40 interpreters provided for in the bill.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. No. The gentleman from Arkansas was strong for a tariff on oil, and he ought to be in favor of any good tariff bill. You have brought in a rule to gag us and force this ridiculous tariff bill upon us. I do not particularly object to the method because the party in power generally follows that procedure. I do not find fault with the method, but I do object to the impalatable dose. You did the same with your Underwood bill. You brought in what you called a liberal rule, but you caucused in this room every day on every schedule, and strict orders were given to defeat every amendment offered on the Republican side. That was just mock liberality and did not mean anything. All this talk about insurmountable tariff barriers and rates is just hokum—boloney. True, our imports are decreasing in dollar value, but in many instances volume is increased. We are suffering a double penalty, because of a depreciation of the currency of foreign countries—an ad valorem rate of 45 per cent against England and Japan is now only 30 per cent. You do not lose revenue on specific duties, except by the loss of volume, but on the ad valorem you lose every time an invoice is received. We lose at the spigot, which is the customs house, and we lose at the bunghole, because we are losing all of the labor in production and the wages that would be paid, if our own goods were produced to take the place of foreign merchandise.

When the glassworkers were down here a few weeks ago, they presented evidence to the Tariff Commission that one of the greatest hotels in New York had put out bids for glassware, for tumblers, for plates, for cake baskets, and all of the glass paraphernalia that goes into a hotel of that kind. Some American concerns put in bids at a very small profit above overhead in order to keep their men employed, and what happened? Czechoslovakia and Belgium were 15 to 18 per cent lower than the American bids. The foreign bids included tariff and the transportation, and the contract was given to Czechoslovakia and Belgium. Here in Washington and New York City the Sunday papers are filled with advertisements of imported rugs, while the carpet mills in the country are running two days a week.

How can you expect to keep American workmen employed and have regular American pay rolls if the people of this country are not willing to purchase the commodities that American workmen make here in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. KUNZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. KUNZ. Can the gentleman state whether or not the American workman buys imported rugs, or do the men of wealth buy them?

Mr. CROWTHER. Many of the imported rugs are now so cheap that the man of ordinary income can buy them. You can buy a Chinese rug, 9 by 12, as cheap as $175. We make a first-class rug, a wonderful rug, in this country for $100, and they will outwear the cheap oriental.

Mr. CONNERY. I just wanted the gentleman to know that I intended to vote against this rule.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am glad to know that.

I regret to find my colleagues on this side in this mood. By the passage of this bill you are not doing anything to help the situation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I have been here with my genial friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] for about eight or nine years, and I have about concluded the gentleman is for a protective tariff. [Laughter.] I think if the gentleman keeps on talking he will convince himself that he stands for that.

I want to discuss just what is contained as the subject matter of this rule. There are just three changes made by the Senate. One of them is the antimonopoly provision, another the elimination of the 60-day provision in the flexible clause, and the other is the authorization provision having to do with the international conference. I want to call the attention of the House to those three things for just a few moments. Personally I was for the 60-day clause, providing a rate made by the Tariff Commission should become effective if not acted upon by Congress within 60 days, but the Senate has seen fit to eliminate it. I would call attention to the fact that the bill is in exactly the same shape, as far as it relates to the flexible provision, as it was the day it came from the committee. Now, let us see if all this ranting about the international conference has any ground.

In the first place, one of our friends assured us that we need have no hesitancy in voting as we pleased upon this measure, because we have the bulwark of the President of the United States back of us, in that he will veto it as soon as it reaches him, and he insists that we get it through in a hurry.

An international conference on the tariff is not a new thing to us, understand that. Another thing I want you to understand is that this is in no wise a treaty, as was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts. We have been conducting international conferences upon the tariff, as a sort of stepchild to the League of Nations, for years, and our own Government has been sitting in upon those conferences unofficially. To-day you have negotiations with France emanating from the State Department in Washington.

What does this provision seek to do? It simply seeks to get the nations of the earth together around the table and see how the tariff has affected the world's economic condition, and if it has, whereby an exchange of opinion may not bring about a lowering of the tariff or an increase of the tariff for this nation or that nation, as the case may be. It simply initiated a movement for better understanding of trade relations and trade understanding among the nations of the earth.

Then what do we have? Under the provisions of this bill our conferees come back here and make a report, and that report is acted upon by the Congress of the United States. My friend the gentleman from New York, Doctor CROWTHER, says that they will meet us in a few months upon the tariff question. If there is anybody on God's green footstool that ought not make an issue of the tariff this fall, it is the Republican Party. If their memories are no longer than to recall what happened to them in 1928 as a result of the Smoot-Hawley bill, then I invite them again to a hospitable grave in 1932.

They say they have a bulwark in the White House against this tariff measure. They say this is the graveyard of Democratic hopes. Well, in God's name, if this is the graveyard of Democratic hopes, then deliver the American people from the cyclone of this Republican prosperity. [Laughter and applause.]

praying into its sacred folds, he said it would be but a short time until prosperity would be restored to this country, and yet he has the unmitigated nerve to stand here to-day, after having made that statement, and give unlimited praise to the passage of the Smoot-Hawley bill with multiplied millions in this country begging for work. Yes; they have a bulwark in the White House, because at the time he signed the Smoot-Hawley bill there were lying on his desk the signatures of over a thousand economists in this country, which came from the great universities, beseeching him as President of the United States, to veto that bill. You bet he is a bulwark. [Applause.]

Oh, yes. They say he is a bulwark. At the time he affixed his signature to that document, carrying to the people the burden of the Smoot-Hawley bill, lying upon his desk was the solemn protest of 33 sovereign nations of this earth, asking him not to disturb trade conditions in this country, but to veto that bill, but the Republican bulwark in the White House deafened his ears not only to the cry of the American economists but also American business interests and the farming interests of this country and signed that bill. Yes; he was a bulwark when he signed the Smoot-Hawley bill. He was a bulwark against normal prosperous conditions in this country. He was a bulwark against the employment of more than 8,000,000 men. Yes; he has been a bulwark against the peaceful and prosperous pursuits of millions of men in many countries. He has undoubtedly been the greatest and most expensive bulwark against a healthy and prosperous international trade relation the world has ever known. Yes; he is a bulwark. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CRISP and Mr. PURNELL asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 202, nays 171, not voting 58, as follows:

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was in the hall talking to my colleague and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman qualifies.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. This is the first time the present occupant of the chair has had to rule on this question. The Chair has consulted the Parliamentarian and is advised that the Member in order to qualify must answer the question: "Was the gentleman in the hall listening when his name was called" in the affirmative. The gentleman made the statement that he was in the hall, but that he was talking to his colleague when his name was called.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I was here listening, except temporarily when I was talking to my colleague.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair is going pretty far in this ruling.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will say he was in the Hall listening when his name was called, the gentleman will qualify.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I was listening all the time except that moment perhaps.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman was not listening when his name was called.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I would have voted "no," so let it go at that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to be absolutely fair. When he asked the gentleman if he was in the Hall listening when his name was called he must answer "yes"; otherwise he does not qualify.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "no." I was in the telephone booth in the cloakroom when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11267, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to inquire the status of the parliamentary situation when we adjourned last night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] offered an amendment to strike out certain sections. Debate has been closed and that amendment is now pending. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 4, line 20, after the word "enacted" insert "Provided, That such employees shall be paid in addition to their regular salaries the equivalent salary for the added half day's work."

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is designed to increase the expenditures of the Government rather than to decrease them. It is therefore not germane to the bill or to the title now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized on the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for an additional half day's work by Federal employees. My amendment provides that because of the half day's work additionally imposed upon Federal employees they shall be paid for that half day's work a sum equivalent to the half day's work. I think my amendment is absolutely germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair is ready to rule. The whole purpose and tenor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] is to effectuate economies in government. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] would provide for an increase in expenses, and consequently of appropriations, were it attached to this bill.

The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out paragraph (a) of section 105.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. When the committee recessed last evening there was a point of order pending, at the time the gentleman from Alabama moved that the committee rise. I am sure the Journal will show that there was a point of order pending at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state what point of order was pending?

Mr. DYER. The point of order that was made was that debate upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts had been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair sustained the point of order before the committee rose.

Mr. DYER. The RECORD does not show that fact. The Journal may show it, but the RECORD does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again sustain it, as he did last night. Debate is closed on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York now offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. If debate is closed on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, would not the regular order be a vote upon that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, as the Chair understands, is a perfecting amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 4, line 14, strike out paragraph (a).

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the law giveth and the law taketh away—cursed be the name of the law. That should be the text for this bill.

For years by law we have been building up for the Federal employees a salary schedule that meant a livable status, and overnight by this bill we would reduce them to a condition akin to slavery. We cut them in salaries 11 per cent, and then force an extra one-half day's work on them without pay, in effect giving them a 20 per cent cut.

President Hoover, in his speech of acceptance at Palo Alto, promised workmen plenty of leisure. That promise he has kept too well as far as the jobless are concerned. As far as the Federal employees are concerned, he would take away the little leisure they have.

The Government by this bill is adding to the fallacy of no work, no play, by stating it no work, no play, no pay.

Yesterday it pained me to hear that distinguished humanitarian, WILL WOOD, insist on doing away with the half holiday on Saturday, but he has always been against luxuries.

One time he thought Hoover was a luxury. Luxury is complimentary compared to what WOOD really thinks his semi-Democratic chief is to-day. But WILL WOOD is game; he would prove Old Nick himself was Sir Galahad if he had the Republican nomination.

The two major parties in the face of the depression are as strong as a corporal's guard. This bill, representing the combined effort of the White House and Capitol to coax the prosperity mouse from around the corner is not even a good piece of cheese.

This bill proves that there is a world of difference between economics and economy. What a chance there is for a third party! With the Federal employees and taxpayers singing, "Why don't you take all of me," with the Republicans crooning, "Deficit stay away from my door," and the Democratic leaders acting like "Minnie the Moocher, kicking the gong around," what a chance for a liberal party with a wet anthem, "My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty." [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

The question was taken, and a division was demanded by Mr. McCORMACK.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona and Mr. McCORMACK.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 141, noes 118.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER: Strike out all of sections 101, 102, 103, 104 of Title I of the McDuffie amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE I—FURLOUGH OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

FURLOUGH PROVISIONS

SECTION 101. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933:

(a) The days of work of a per diem officer or employee receiving compensation at a rate which is equivalent to more than $1,500 per annum shall not exceed five in any one week, and the compensation for five days shall be ten-elevenths of that payable for a week's work of five and one-half days: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying the method of fixing the daily rate of compensation of per diem officers or employees as now authorized by law: Provided further, That where the nature of the duties of a per diem officer or employee render it advisable, the provisions of subsection (b) may be applied in lieu of the provisions of this subsection.

(b) Each officer or employee receiving compensation on an annual basis at the rate of more than $1,500 per annum shall be furloughed without compensation for one calendar month, or for such periods as shall in the aggregate be equivalent to one calendar month, for which latter purpose 24 working days (counting Saturday as one-half day) shall be considered as the equivalent of one calendar month: Provided, That where the nature of the duties of any such officer or employee render it advisable, the provisions of subsection (a) may be applied in lieu of the provisions of this subsection.

(c) The compensation paid any officer or employee to whom this section applies shall, notwithstanding the provisions of this section, be an amount not less than an amount calculated at the rate of $1,500 per annum.

SEC. 102. No officer or employee shall be exempted from the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of section 101, except in those cases where the public service requires that the position be continuously filled and a suitable substitute can not be provided, and then only when authorized or approved in writing by the President of the United States.

SEC. 103. All rights now conferred or authorized to be conferred by law upon any officer or employee (whose compensation is at a rate of more than $1,500 per annum) to receive annual leave of absence with pay are hereby suspended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 104. When used in sections 101, 102, and 103 of this act:

(a) The terms "officer" and "employee" mean any person rendering services in or under any branch or service of the United States Government or the government of the District of Columbia, but do not include (1) officers whose compensation may not, under the Constitution, be diminished during their continuance in office; (2) Senators, Representatives in Congress, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners; (3) officers and employees on the rolls of the Senate and House of Representatives; (4) carriers in the Rural Mail Delivery Service; (5) policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia; and (6) commissioners of the United States Shipping Board, members of the Federal Farm Board (except the Secretary of Agriculture), members of the International Joint Commission, United States section, or members of the Board of Mediation.

(b) The term "compensation" means any salary, pay, wage, allowance (except allowances for subsistence, quarters, heat, light, and travel), or other emolument paid for services rendered, but does not include (1) retired pay included within section 106; (2) payments out of any retirement, disability, or relief fund made up wholly or in part of contributions of officers or employees; (3) compensation the amount of which is expressly fixed by international agreement; or (4) compensation paid under the terms of any contract in effect on the date of the enactment of this act if such compensation may not lawfully be reduced.

COMPENSATION REDUCTIONS IN SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

This section shall not reduce below $1,500 per annum the rate of retired pay of any person to whom this section applies.

RURAL CARRIERS' EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE

SEC. 107. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, payments for equipment maintenance to carriers in the Rural Mail Delivery Service shall be three-eighths of the amount now provided by law.

In the case of a corporation the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States, the holders of the stock on behalf of the United States, or such persons as represent the interest of the United States in such corporation, shall take such action as may be necessary to apply the provisions of sections 101, 102, and 103 to offices, positions, and employments under such corporation and to officers and employees thereof.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this substitute be closed within one-half hour.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand the request.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The request was that we use 30 minutes in discussing this substitute.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Let us make the request plain, and I want the gentleman from Missouri to listen. This is not to shut off amendments or to shut off debates on amendments. The request is in the nature of having so much time for general debate on this proposition.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The unanimous-consent request refers only to the gentleman's amendment and not to any amendments thereto.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If that is the case, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman's request for 30 minutes on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa alone?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is the request. If that is not satisfactory to the gentleman from Iowa, and the gentleman feels he must have 30 minutes' general debate on this item alone, I am perfectly willing to agree to it. However, gentlemen, we can not be too lenient in debate here if we hope to get through with this bill this week.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There are requests for more time from several Members on this side, and I am wondering if we can not make it 30 minutes to the side, with the Chair to control the time, of course—30 minutes for the amendment and 30 minutes opposed to the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That does not include any debate on any other amendments?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; in other words, we would have one hour of debate on this substitute.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It seems to me that is quite a long time.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, we need more time. This is the main provision in the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Some people think otherwise.

Mr. SNELL. It is one of the main provisions in the bill, and we must have some time to discuss it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That may be true in the opinion of the gentleman from New York, but some people think there are other important provisions in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I said it was one of the main provisions in the bill, or I meant to say that, anyway.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I wonder if we could not make it 40 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want 10 minutes, if I can get it, to discuss this matter. I have not taken up any time in this debate.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We are quite anxious to hear from the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. SNELL. We have requests definitely for 35 minutes over here.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We have requests for one hour and a half over here definitely; but if we are going to accede to all requests, we will be here until Christmas.

Mr. SNELL. But the general understanding when we started was that while we would only have two hours on the bill in general debate, when we came to the amendments there would be reasonable time allowed to discuss them.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman understands that under the 5-minute rule if some one objects, the debate is limited to 10 minutes. I hope the gentleman will accede to my suggestion. On the next four or five titles I am almost sure there is going to be very little demand for general debate.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Very well; we will go along with the gentleman. The request, Mr. Chairman, is that we have one hour of general debate on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, of course, means one hour of debate under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am not, of course, going to object, but so there may be no misunderstanding, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], as I understand, has an amendment to the substitute which he intends to offer; is that correct?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That will take some time for discussion, and I have an amendment that, as I understand it, is not included.

Mr. McDUFFIE. No. Let us have an understanding. I want to keep faith with my colleagues, but I thought we might dispose of this within an hour.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know how many amendments are to be offered, but they are of such a character that they have to be explained and answered. This is the main amendment, so far as I know; and as far as I know there will be 30 minutes on this amendment, and the rest of the discussion will be on amendments to the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That will mean 20 minutes to 4 before we take up anything further. I am willing to proceed, for we all want to be fair. The gentleman will realize that if we do not limit debate we can not finish the bill this week or the week after.

Mr. RAMSEYER. After the hour there will be only five minutes to each amendment on a side. An hour is not a very long time considering that the provisions affect a million Government employees—in fact, all the employees in the country.

Mr. BRITTEN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman realizes that one hour is not a long time. If it is divided into four parts it is only 15 minutes for four Members, two on each side. That is a very limited debate for an amendment as important as this.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It is not my desire to unduly limit the discussion of the staggering plan of the President. I want to keep faith, and I think, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that we have an hour—thirty minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this one hour is exclusively on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the time will be divided equally between those for and those opposed to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be entirely within the province of the Chair, and the Chair as far as possible will try to divide the time equally between those favoring and those opposed to the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I addressed the House last night on this proposal, and I am not going to take over five minutes now. I merely want to explain to you in a general way what this amendment does.

The bill (H. R. 11597) was offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE]. The first title of the McDuffie bill is "Compensation reduction of Federal employees." The first four sections of the bill have to do with the 11 per cent pay cut proposal.

Now, there are other sections in the title that are not related directly to the pay-cut plan. My amendment strikes out the first four sections and inserts in lieu thereof the furlough plan.

These are the first four sections of the bill, and I move to strike them out and insert in lieu of these sections the furlough plan, and cut out of the committee print those portions which are foreign to the furlough plan.

The furlough plan, section 101 of the bill, relates to per diem employees, and it establishes the principle of the 5-day week. The pay is in proportion to the reduction in time. That is paragraph (a) of section 101. Paragraph (b) of section 101 deals with the compensation of annual employees, and they are virtually placed on a 5-day week, in that for one month in the year they are given a furlough without pay. So it establishes the principle of the 5-day week in the Government service.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Of course, it can not apply to the legislative branch. We have to leave that system and go to the pay-cut system.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly. This amendment does not affect any employee who receives less than $1,500. No employee will be affected who receives compensation at the rate of less than $1,500 per annum.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS. Am I correct in assuming that if this furlough plan is not adopted many of the employees of the Government would be dismissed?

Mr. RAMSEYER. There is no question about that; if the appropriation bills keep on being cut as they have been in the Senate, it will throw many Government employees out on the street without jobs. This plan, as I explained last night, will save many employees that I am sure will be without jobs if the furlough plan is not adopted.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman tell us why?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Because the time is reduced, and it furnishes opportunity for substitute workers, as I pointed out, in the Postal Service. Section 104 of my amendment is devoted to definitions and compensation. Section 105 has to do with the salaries of Members of the House, Resident Commissioners, and so forth, and they are reduced a flat 10 per cent. The clerks and employees of the House and Senate are reduced 8.3 per cent—in other words, one-twelfth—and it puts them on the same basis as the Government employees. The retired pay is taken care of in section 106, and the persons who receive retired pay, except persons who contributed to the fund from which they draw retirement pay, are cut 8.3 per cent, or one month. Section 107 has to do with rural carriers, and section 108 with employees of corporations whose stock is owned by the Government, and employees there are put under the furlough plan.

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit for printing in the RECORD the following statement:

WHY THE FURLOUGH PLAN SHOULD BE ADOPTED

1. It maintains the standard of living established by the Government among its own employees, with the mere temporary concession on their part that they are to take their holidays without pay. It does not permit private industry to use the pay cut to Federal employees as an excuse for further bearing down on the standards of living of the Nation. Federal employees have not been increased in the ratios of private industry and private occupations. The greater security of Federal employment is perhaps some compensation. Private business and industry should not be given the lead and the moral background by the Government for pay cutting which is unwarranted and uneconomical to the whole community.

2. Under the persuasion of the Government private industry early in the depression undertook to stagger employment in order that all employees might receive some income and should be held from the obligation of the local communities to provide for their destitution. The Government, having asked this service of industry, makes a poor showing to-day to be dismissing its employees right and left without doing for them the same service of dividing the amount of work which remains among the total number of its employees. For the Government to thrust 60,000 to 80,000 people into the pool of unemployment and at the same time appropriate money for public works in aid of unemployment is unjust and illogical. The inhumanity and sheer malevolence of increasing the burden of the local communities with a vast number of Federal Government employees will bring upon the Federal Government not only the censure of these communities but the just claim from them that it should provide for the destitution created by this unnecessary action.

3. There is bound to be a great reduction in our governmental expenditures. The President's Budget when sent to Congress provided for $369,000,000 reduction. Our Appropriations Committees are engaged in making further reductions. These reductions will all be expressed in the dismissal of employees. You can not reduce Government functions without reducing Government personnel, but in order to meet this situation the President has made the humane suggestion that the remaining work in the Government should be divided amongst the whole governmental staff in order that there should be no increase in destitution at the hands of the Government.

4. As a matter of fact, it is reported by administration officials that in order to work the administration's furlough plan it will be necessary to take on some minor number of substitutes and provide them with at least part-time employment. So the plan proposed not only prevents increase in destitution in the country; it actually diminishes the amount of dependency which our local communities are compelled to support. We would call the attention of the Members to the fact that appropriation bills which have been passed by this House carry for public works and maintenance some $440,000,000. The only justification for this public-works program is that we should create employment; yet here on the one hand we propose to dismiss a vast number of Government employees and on the other hand hire other people with Government money.

5. The plan as proposed produces as great economy as the straight pay cut. In fact, it provides something more. Therefore it has a greater advantage from the point of view of expenditures.

6. If this Nation is to recover from this depression, it can not make progress by deliberately increasing destitution on one hand and by lowering the standards of income of the people on the other. It is true we must reduce the expenditures of the Government, and here is a statesmanlike plan by which we avoid the major difficulties which the problem presents to us.

7. To any student of American life, there must be a realization that the vast speed with which we have mechanized our people has contributed to this depression in the amount of unemployment that has arisen through the rapid application of labor-saving devices. One of the soundest methods proposed for aid in recovery from this depression is to decrease the number of hours so as to spread the area of employment. The President, in proposing the plan that the Government should adopt a 5-day week or the equivalent thereof is setting up the flag of leadership by the Federal Government in a most important change in our economic system. It is one in support of which every labor leader in the United States should rise. It is one to which every single person who hopes for the ultimate recovery of America must give thought and attention. It is the business of the Government in the conduct of its affairs to establish the moral and economic standards of leadership for the country as a whole. This whole idea of the straight pay cut, the dismissal of thousands of Government employees is the most medieval and heartless action ever proposed by any government that claims to have the enlightenment of the American Government.

The provisions of sections 101 to 104, inclusive, in the substitute draft of Title I are designed to secure a reduction in the pay roll of the Federal Government in the most equitable way possible and with the least injury to the Government service and the interests of the public. They were designed to afford practically equivalent treatment to different groups of employees who, for practical reasons, it seemed necessary to handle on a different basis.

On construction and manufacturing projects where the bulk of the pay roll is on a per diem basis the most practicable solution seemed to be the adoption of a 5-day week, cutting off the Saturday morning work and correspondingly reducing pay—that is, by one-eleventh. The one-eleventh was arrived at on the basis that the employee now works 5½ days, or 11 half days, and that cutting off one-half day of work would be cutting off one-eleventh of the time worked and a corresponding reduction of pay would be one-eleventh of the pay now received.

In the majority of the office groups where the work involves more or less contact with private concerns and individuals, the closing of the office on Saturday morning throughout the Government service did not appear to be practicable, but approximate equality of treatment would be afforded by providing for furlough without pay for one calendar month or for such scattered periods as would be in the aggregate equivalent to one calendar month, for which purpose a calendar month would be considered 24 working days (counting Saturday as one half day).

The provision that all rights to annual leave of absence with pay be suspended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, is an integral part of this proposal, the practical effect of the whole plan being the substitution of a furlough without pay for annual leave with pay, so far as annual employees are concerned.

Rural mail carriers would be exempted from the application of all of these provisions, and in place of them the allowance for equipment maintenance would be reduced during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, to three-eighths of that now provided by law. Provision is made that this shall not apply to employees receiving $1,200 per year or less and that no employee shall be reduced below that figure.

The estimated saving under this plan has been calculated on the following basis: From the total pay roll of $1,315,690,000 there have been deducted the amounts of the pay rolls for the following employees:

Pay of employees receiving $1,200 per year or less	$228,000,000
Policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia	5,331,000
Postal Service employees (estimated separately)	520,363,000

A total of $753,694,000, which leaves a balance of $561,996,000. As information is not available regarding the number of per diem employees receiving $1,200 a year or less, a split of this $561,996,000 between per diem employees and annual employees could not be made, and consequently the amount to be multiplied by one-twelfth and the amount to be multiplied by one-eleventh in computing the saving is not known. However, multiplying the entire sum by one-twelfth gives a figure of $46,833,000, which is a smaller amount than would be obtained if one-eleventh were applied to that portion of the pay roll covering per diem employees, and this smaller figure has been used for the sake of conservative estimating.

The Postmaster General has estimated with regard to Postal Service employees that after making allowance for necessary substitutes to take the place of employees furloughed without pay in order to maintain the Postal Service, the reduction in pay roll accomplished by this plan would amount to $24,568,465.

Adding the $46,833,000 and the $24,568,465 gives a total saving of $71,401,465, exclusive of the reduction of vehicle maintenance allowances to rural mail carriers, which is estimated at $10,312,500. As this latter is a part of the plan submitted, and in lieu of the provisions for furloughing or 5-day week, it should be added to the $71,401,465, making a total estimated saving of $81,713,965.

Information is not available to estimate accurately the savings on the legislative branch of the Government, but allowing for a few necessary substitutes it is believed that the total savings would amount to at least $83,000,000.

WM. R. WOOD.
WILLIAM WILLIAMSON.
C. W. RAMSEYER.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have taken five minutes at this time to announce that if the House votes down the Ramseyer amendment I expect to ask recognition of the Chair to move to strike out Title I. In other words, now that we have fixed up the Saturday-afternoon proposition, have put a $2,500 exemption in, I think we ought to do a good job and not cut anybody's wages in the Government.

I would like to call the attention of the House to the following: The Chestnut Farms Dairy, a milk concern in the city of Washington, I am reliably informed, have given out notices to their employees that beginning with the 1st of April their employees are to take an 11 per cent cut. Here we have the significant 11 per cent cut patterned after Congress. We have the 15 per cent cut of the Steel Corporation, but this is the first time that we have had an 11 per cent, showing that all of the industries now are watching us here, and that as soon as we put through this 11 per cent they are going to put a general 11 per cent cut through in every industry in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. But there is an exemption, of course, in the Government cut of $1,000, and the cut applies only on amounts above that sum, while in industry they do not get any exemption.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, we have a $2,500 exemption; but I am against any pay cuts for reasons that I have already told the House. I believe this is just an invitation to private industry to cut and slash again and again. I have listened to the debates in this House, and no one has convinced me yet of the wisdom of cutting Federal employees' pay. If we do, and it is followed by cuts in industry all through the United States, where are the people going to get any money to buy the manufactured and farm products and bring back prosperity?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. If these cuts keep going through the Senate of 10 per cent, that will turn the men entirely out, and why not pass this so that we can keep those men at work.

Mr. CONNERY. They can keep them at work if they want to. Why do not they start public construction; why not give the people work in the United States instead of cutting the Federal wages, and putting Washington on the dole system just like every other city in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. What I am trying to bring before the House is this: That if they make 10 per cent cuts in the Senate and we adopt them here, it will throw 30,000 men out of employment in the Mail Service; but if we pass this amendment, we will have something to keep those men at work.

Mr. CONNERY. If we show the other body that we do not intend to have any cut, it will make a great deal of difference. Let us consolidate the Army and the Navy. What about the $7,000,000 that the House cut out for the Rogers-Clark monument, and the Indian affair claims that do not need to be put into effect at the present time? We cut it out in the House and the Senate put it back again—$7,000,000. It came back to the House, and the House sent it to the President without any conference. If that is economy, then show me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And will happen if the Senate cuts 10 per cent, as in the Interior appropriation bill, and this House goes through with it. There will be nothing left for the employees. That is the danger that we have to avoid, and that has happened on the Interior appropriation bill. That is already passed, and the President has signed it with an arbitrary 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. CONNERY. And with no chance to find out what happened to the $7,000,000 economy plan. You talk about the 10 per cent. Why not save money at the expense of something that does not need to be done at this time and not take it out of already underpaid Government workers? Why do we not put some men to work? Why do we not start public construction and let the people have money to pay the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, and start prosperity again, and not be catering and pandering to the propaganda of the big-moneyed interests? It was said last night, "The eyes of the Nation are on us." I was home last week and I told them about the eyes of the Nation, and I told them I was not going to cut anybody's salary, including the salaries of Congressmen, and I told them why, and they said, "You are right." I will take my chances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the committee some matters that I think will be of interest to all the Members in connection with the President's proposed staggering plan.

In 1913 the total tax burden in the United States, including local, State, and Federal, was $2,187,000,000, or 6.4 per cent of the national income. In 1923 it was $7,234,000,000, or 10.1 per cent of the national income. In 1930 the total tax load was $10,251,000,000, or 14.4 per cent of the national income. This meant a per capita tax in 1913 of $22.60 and in 1930, $83.21.

In addition to this, local, State, and National Governments incurred indebtedness during the years 1913 to 1930 totaling $30,200,000,000, which must be added to the taxes collected to make up the staggering total cost of government for the period.

That overwhelming expenditure, together with the inability of the people to carry the tax load, has focused the attention of the country on the absolute necessity for economy in governmental expenditures. Governments can not continue to go on and spend 25 per cent of the national income. Such extravagance is bound to be repudiated at the polls. It is intolerable, and means confiscation, and in the end socialization of all tangible property.

Now, there is only one way to remedy this situation, and that is to cut the overhead in local, State, and National Governments. On yesterday this committee cut the savings of $57,000,000, which the committee plan carried in the reduced salary schedules for the fiscal year of 1933, to a point where the saving is now only $9,104,000. That means that yesterday's action cut from the amendment approximately $48,000,000.

This morning Members struck from the amendment the half-holiday provision. That reduces the saving an additional $9,000,000. That means, Mr. Chairman, that so far as Title I of the committee amendment is concerned, there is little saving left.

There is one matter which I think the Members have overlooked, and that is the fact that if the Senate continues with its 10 per cent reduction program for all appropriation bills which it is the general understanding that it intends to do, there will be thrown out of employment from seventy to eighty thousand people who are now in the Government service. In other words, it is simply a question of whether we will stagger the employees or whether we will put from seventy to eighty thousand of them upon the streets with no chance to get employment. That is the issue that faces this committee and Congress.

Permit me to call your attention to what will happen under these cuts. The Interior Department was referred to last night by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. The Interior Department has been cut to a point which will result in throwing some 2,000 employees upon the streets by July 1 in that department. In the Department of Agriculture, under the cuts contemplated, we will lose a total of 4,470 employees. The Commerce Department will lose 2,591; the Justice Department 900; the Labor Department 616; the Navy Department 9,000.

In the Post Office Department, in which all of us are interested probably more than any other, 41,792 people will have to be discharged. The Treasury Department will lose 6,172 people; the State Department, 456; the War Department, 7,600; the District of Columbia, 1,283; the Veterans' Administration, 4,000. The total loss in the Government service, if the 10 per cent reduction by the Senate prevails, according to the estimates made by the Bureau of the Budget, sent here this morning, will be 81,743 men and women. The estimates made by the Budget are, of course, approximations, based upon what the Senate has so far done and the announcement of the leaders as to policy. It is clear, however, that a very serious situation has been developed from the standpoint of the Government employee. It is about as certain as that night follows day that the cuts in the appropriations will be made in the Senate, and it is equally certain that such cuts will be approved by the House. There will be a chance under the furlough plan to take care of that situation by putting employees on a 5-day week, and what is equivalent to it for those who are paid upon an annual basis. It means that per diem will be paid in full for five days in place of five and one-half days, as now. Employees paid on an annual basis will be furloughed for 30 days without pay or for 24 working days, including half holidays. That is all there is to the furlough plan when stripped of the technical language of the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Who is going to do the work of the employees who are furloughed for 30 days?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, the gentleman knows that they take 30 days' leave now, and the average leave to-day is 28 days, which is more than the furlough plan provides for. They are not doing the work now. It means they will do just as much work as they are doing now but will be paid only for the time they work. We will save the difference between five days and five days and a half in pay and one month's pay of every employee in the Government service.

This saving will make it possible to meet the Senate reductions without dismissing thousands of men now in the service. At the same time there will be a substantial reduction of force by death, resignation, and retirement, as no new appointments can be made except when indispensably necessary.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The plan contemplates doing away with all annual leave?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It does not do away with the annual leave. They get it, but they get it without pay.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then they are away two months?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No, no. We have not provided for anything of the kind. It makes it compulsory to take the regular annual leave of 30 days without pay. They now get paid for that time. By denying pay for leave some $75,000,000 will be saved under the Ramseyer amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I can not yield now. I only have 10 minutes.

It seems to me there can not be any question as to the wisdom of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. There is nothing left of the pay-cut plan. In other words, there is not going to be any saving of consequence in the pay-cut plan as it now stands. Because it represents little saving, it does not afford a basis for absorbing Senate slashes except by wholesale dismissals. The furlough plan will largely cushion these reductions and enable the Government to function.

It means, in other words, a staggering plan which will keep these people at work on a part-time basis and save many of them from becoming public charges.

Now, let us look at the rural-carrier situation and see what is going to happen there. If the appropriations in the Senate are cut as contemplated and approved by the House, it means a loss of 8,000 and a corresponding curtailment of service. Eighteen thousand carriers will be stricken from the lists in the cities. Your village carriers will have to be reduced by 1,000 and railway postal clerks by 2,200. Unless this plan is adopted, you are going to take out of employment a vast army which will be thrown upon the communities of the Nation. Unable to find employment under present conditions, many of them will become objects of charity. You can save these men and prevent the demoralization of the Government service by accepting the President's furlough plan. I hope the amendment is adopted. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend I append the following tables, which have been prepared by the Budget and which are self-explanatory. They are as accurate as available data make possible:

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my feelings about this whole problem are that the membership of this House has not given this Economy Committee the support it is entitled to. [Applause.] This is a nonpartisan committee set up by this House to do a particular piece of work. The committee came in with its recommendations as embodied in the committee bill.

Speaking for myself, I was in favor of the committee program. The action of the House last evening amounted to a rejection of the committee's plan, so far as economy legislation effecting the reduction of salaries of Federal employees is concerned.

The amendment now before the committee represents the minority views of the Economy Committee. As I see it, since this group, when the committee program was under consideration, fell in line and gave full and unstinted support, good sportsmanship, if not good faith, demands that we on the Democratic side who are earnestly and sincerely endeavoring to bring about economy legislation, give our support to the Ramseyer amendment and, if possible, bring about its adoption. [Applause.] This is the last opportunity this committee will have to express itself upon the question of economy as it relates to the reduction of the salaries of the Federal employees. There is no economy in this regard in the action taken by the committee last evening.

I fear that in the consideration of this entire problem we have so focused our consideration upon the interest of the Federal employee that we have forgotten the millions throughout the country who are unorganized and have no one to whom to look to serve the general welfare, and, therefore, their personal welfare, except Members of this House.

There was never a time in the whole history of the world when the burdens of government rested so heavily upon the backs of the people as at this very hour. Debts, national and private, are pressing us down into the very slough of despond, upon the brink of which we are now lingering. There are those who are entitled to look to this House for representation other than the Federal employees.

I want to say to those of you who possibly have not had occasion to visit back in the States in recent weeks or months, that there is a feeling of hostility growing up in the hearts of the people against the Federal employees. The interests of the Federal employees themselves demand that this body take some action toward the readjustment of salaries in behalf of reinstating them in the confidence and the esteem of the people. It is a sorry employee or officeholder who is not willing to make some reasonable sacrifice for his Government.

The one thing that is essential to good legislation is public confidence, and just so certainly as you break down this effort to bring about a readjustment of the pay of Federal employees and officeholders you are going to have an unfavorable reaction against yourselves and call in question the patriotism and integrity of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. I think that this is good information for the House.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I can but agree with practically everything that has been said by the gentleman from Georgia. I feel, in view of the attitude I have always assumed on this committee, that I should rise here now and plead for the Government employees, many of whom, though overworked and underpaid according to some gentlemen, and fine ladies and gentlemen they are, have found time to-day from their duties to crowd these galleries to-day. I have tried to help them, and they prefer the committee plan.

The gentleman is correct when he says that unless something is done in a reasonable way to effect economies by the reduction of public salaries now, the day may come in this country when this Congress will have to do what it does not now wish to do, and that is to cut until it really hurts.

Now, I have no objection to the President's plan because it is the President's plan. I object to it on principle and because it will work a hardship on those in the lower grades. Under that plan the poorer-paid employee is cut, in some cases, five times as much as he is cut under the committee's plan. The $1,200 man, for instance, gives up $22 under the committee's plan. We agreed to it, we accepted it, and the committee brought it here in this bill; but I want to say to you that if you desire to adopt the President's plan and accept his plan, though greatly tempered now, it is perfectly agreeable to this committee. We want something done to effect economy; but I feel I should keep faith with my first position in connection with the Government employees and argue in their behalf, because, under this plan, you are doing an injustice to the men in the lower brackets.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In the amendment the amount has been raised from $1,200 to $1,500.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is quite true. The $1,500 man under our plan would give up $55, while under your plan he gives up $125, and for the $1,600 man the same proportion applies, and he gives up only $66, while under your plan it would be $133.30.

I am trying to impress you, gentlemen, with the fact that you can make a reasonable cut and that you ought to do it under the plan originally presented by this committee rather than make those in the lower brackets suffer as much as you will make them suffer under this plan.

But be that as it may, gentlemen, let me say this to you: Personally, and, I think, speaking for the committee, we have no qualms as to what you might think about this whole program. It is not a personal matter with us. Yesterday afternoon the Committee of the Whole was apparently stampeded, and you cut $55,000,000 or $53,000,000 from the plan we have brought to you, unmindful, as the gentleman from Georgia said, of those inarticulate masses who can not speak to you through highly propagandized organizations and long telegrams.

This afternoon—and I think sometimes you have not given it much serious thought—you took $9,000,000 more from this program.

What are you going to do with this program? Are you going to kick it out entirely and tell the country you are not for economy, even though in our program we do not impair the efficiency of this Government in any way by such a program if adopted?

Now, stop and think about that, will you, gentlemen? It is your responsibility even more than it is ours now. What are you going to do about it? Are you going to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who said that the way to bring prosperity is to get more employees and pay them a higher salary?

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. As suggested, though, by the gentleman from Georgia, your plan having been emasculated, what else is there for us to do but accept the President's plan if we want a reduction? [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Possibly nothing else. If this House sees fit to do it, then it is your responsibility.

So far as carrying out the principle which they are trying to inject at the suggestion of the President and Mr. William Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, this staggering plan is not in reality the principle of a 5-day week. You do not carry it through with this plan, because when you get to the legislative branch of the Government you are bound to use the pay-cut system.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, having had some experience a few years ago on the Joint Committee for Reorganization of Executive Departments, I feel like extending my sympathy to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] and his committee and commiserating with them. I want to say for one, out of that experience, that I think this Economy Committee on the whole has done a great piece of work and deserves the commendation of the House for it. The members of the committee have worked day and night for the limited length of time they have had to consider a matter of such magnitude and complexity as they have had before them, and I think they have done a very commendable piece of work. It is a thankless job at best.

If Congress, under pressure of the public mind as it exists at the present time with respect to reduction of expenses, will not pass an economy program of some kind, then there is no hope of its ever doing so in normal times. For one, I feel like overlooking some of the things in the committee report which I would like to have changed and accepting it and voting for it in order to accomplish something toward reducing Government expenses.

Mr. Chairman, there is no economy program, no program of reorganization of executive departments in the world that some employee somewhere in the Government will not object to; and unless this Congress is willing to assume some responsibility of putting one through, there will never be any reorganization or any economy program adopted. Now, so much for that. When I took the floor, I had no intention of saying what I have said, but I feel that in justice to the Economy Committee it ought to be said.

I am in favor of the substitute amendment to Title I, otherwise known as the furlough or staggering plan of the administration, as offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. It also contains a provision for a 10 per cent reduction of the salaries of the Members of Congress, and I am in favor of that. I think our salaries should be reduced at least to that extent during this emergency.

I have never felt that those in the Government service as a whole were overpaid, and I am a firm believer in the policy that the Government should pay those who work for it enough so that men without means or independent incomes can afford to engage in Government service or adopt a Government career, live decently and independently without being forced or tempted to accept favors from special interests or others to whom they should not be under obligation. A plutocracy is the only other alternative.

At the same time the country at present is in a terribly depressed condition. Millions of our fellow citizens are out of work entirely or working part time only. Industry is either shut down or doing business in the red. Under these conditions it seems to me only fair that those of us in the Government service should be willing to accept a temporary reduction in our salaries. In fact we should welcome it.

It seems to me, too, that those of us who favor either the furlough plan of the administration or the McDuffie plan as reported by the Economy Committee, one or the other, are the real friends of the employees of the Government and not those who oppose the adoption of either plan. Everyone here knows that the appropriations for the next fiscal year are going to be materially reduced below what they have been during the last few years. It is also known that the fixed charges of the Government are such that they can not be materially reduced, and, therefore, that the burden of the reduction will fall very heavily upon the employees. It is estimated that unless the furlough plan is adopted or the salaries of the employees are reduced, it will be necessary to discharge as high as 80,000 to 100,000 employees of the Government.

I have had a typical illustration in my home city of how this reduction program which the country is demanding and Congress is adopting works. The Secretary of the Treasury stated before a committee of the Senate last week that if the Senate applied its program of reducing the Treasury appropriation 10 per cent below what was carried in the bill as it passed the House, it would be necessary to close all the internal-customs district offices or ports of entry in the United States. Grand Rapids has such an office. It more than pays its way. There are two men in the office who have been in the Government service upwards of 35 years. If the office is closed, these men will be turned out into the street. In the last three days I have had from 20 to 25 telegrams and letters from importers in my home city, who use this service, protesting against the discontinuance of this office. If the furlough plan is adopted, a great many such employees will be continued in the service who might otherwise lose their positions entirely.

The havoc that will be raised in the Post Office Department, unless some such plan is adopted, is beyond description. If the furlough plan is adopted, it will allow more employees to be kept in the service and will help to take care of the substitutes who have been kept out of work almost entirely for the last year or two.

I am not greatly impressed with the argument that the example set by the Government will have a bad effect upon industry. Industry has not been able to keep men employed in many instances at any price, and everyone would prefer to have work five days in the week rather than none at all. The furlough plan has been adopted by industry so as to keep as many people at work as possible on part time. Why should not the Government do the same temporarily? It has the advantage of not reducing the basic wage scale and, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] yesterday, as he closed his very able presentation and explanation of the amendment—

> The furlough plan saves more money for the Treasury, and at the same time makes it less necessary to discharge employees. It is more economical and beyond question more humane.

And again, as stated in the statement signed by the three Republican members of the Economy Committee—

> You can not reduce Government functions without reducing Government personnel, but in order to meet this situation the President has made the humane suggestion that the remaining work in the Government should be divided amongst the whole governmental staff, in order that there should be no increase in destitution at the hands of the Government. As a matter of fact, it is reported by administration officials that in order to work the administration's furlough plan it will be necessary to take on some minor number of substitutes and provide them with at least part-time employment. So the plan proposed not only prevents increase in destitution in the country; it actually diminishes the amount of dependency which our local communities are compelled to support.

I prefer the Ramseyer substitute, but if it is not adopted, I shall support the original text of Title I.

Mr. KUNZ. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of some of the members of the committee. I commend the action of the Committee on Economy. There is no doubt in my mind but what a great deal of that time has been devoted to facing this crisis that we are about to meet; but I agree more with the gentleman from Iowa, from whose State the keynoter of the Republican Convention will come, and when he said yesterday that we are not prepared to meet this crisis, I believe he is right.

The Committee on Economy met, the facts were presented to them, as they were, but the truth of the matter was not known to them, nor is it known to the people of this country.

Let us face the issue as it is. I remember the last words spoken by our late lamented Speaker when he said to you and to me and to the country that Providence alone knows what the future will bring forth. He then had a feeling in his heart and in his conscience that the world was going wild, and what is the situation we have to-day? The people of the country have no confidence in the Congress.

We talk about economy. You come in here with a bill and ask that the wages of the employees of the Government be reduced 11 per cent. I have none that I am interested in. It is immaterial to me whether the employees of the Government get large salaries or small ones; but I want to say to you, as a humanitarian, and I know that you and every one of you feel as I feel, you do not want the employee of the Government to deprive his child of an education, nor do you want the employee of the Government to deprive his wife of what is coming to her, and if you will only look about the city of Washington about a week before pay day, you will find that in the delicatessen stores of the city of Washington nearly every employee on a small salary is running a bill that has to be paid on pay day out of the salary they are now receiving. What will they do if you reduce that salary? Those who have families of four or five children, those who want to educate their children and elevate them, what are they going to do if you deprive them of that which belongs to them?

We are now called upon to balance the Budget for the mistakes of the Republican Party. Five hundred million dollars was appropriated for the Farm Loan Board, for what? They purchased nonmillable wheat, and only a few days ago I saw a news item where 50,000 sacks of this was shipped to destitute families. The purpose of the appropriation was to help the farmer. It did; it put him out of business. Wheat prices were to be maintained. After the money was spent, the price of wheat immediately dropped, and the explanation coming from the administration was that the world market governed the price and they overlooked a few billion bushels when they wanted the appropriation. All they wanted it for was to pay high salaries and spend the taxpayers' money. Then came the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, another $2,000,000,000 item. For what? To pay salaries up to $16,000 and other salaries higher than the civil-service rates that are now asked to be "whitewashed." These appointments are made from the administration's friends to build up a political machine. Where is the money going? Not to help the people at large. If so, where are the results? No; it goes to Morgan, Kuhn, and Loeb, and others in the wealthy class to protect their loans. The Missouri Pacific Railroad Co. and its subsidiaries received $27,100,000 to pay off the interest owed and for materials already used, this money going to an already bankrupt railroad in order that the vested interests of the country would get theirs, and to the devil with the people. Again, another movement of the administration was when billions of dollars' worth of foreign bonds were sold into this country with the approval of the Treasury and State Departments. Those facts are proven daily in the Senate hearings.

The Secretary of the State Department, Mr. Stimson, who is now enjoying a steamer trip at an additional expense of $300,000 to the Government, to be at Geneva with a view of disarming the world, testified before the Ways and Means Committee that the State Department had knowledge that these bonds were being floated, but it was a private transaction. Look at the market price of these bonds to-day. They were paid for in good American dollars, cent for cent, and now they are practically worthless. After exploiting the people of the country the gentleman on the avenue now wants to suck the blood out of the Federal worker, who has given his life's work to the Government, to save a paltry $67,000,000; this brought about in such a way as to imply that those who can pay and who have made the profit are now broke. What did the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton" do? Through the Treasury Department word went out to the banks of this country to accept the bonds of foreign governments as collateral in preference to first mortgages on property of the various States of the Union, and when the hoax was perpetrated on the American public, he went out with his examiners and said to the banks "write off those bonds" at the present market price. That is the main reason for the failure of any number of banking institutions in this country; and his Reconstruction Finance Corporation is now bolstering up the banks, with the money of the taxpayers of the country, in order that the international bankers along with the superintellectuals in banking in this country may be paid off at the expense of the American people. With all this waste of the peoples' money, they now come forth with the proposition to cut the Federal employees of the Government. Where does this information emanate from? From the paid propaganda of the vested interests. If the Federal salaries are slashed, it will be the opening wedge for a general reduction in wages throughout the United States.

There are two ways out of this depression. One way is to put a tax on beer. Since the advent of prohibition this country has lost in revenue $10,500,000,000. In addition to that, $300,000,000 has been thrown away in a vain attempt to enforce this unenforceable law, with the actual result that there has been a large increase in the consumption of liquor in this country over the 1919 basis. Where in the history of civilization was there ever such an economic folly? In addition to the economic burdens pressed upon the backs of our people we have experienced the greatest period of criminality in the history of the Nation; respect for law and official authority has been uprooted, and we have become a nation of hypocrites by preaching the virtue of temperance and making liquor in our homes. Were it not for this "noble experiment," we would not now be facing the tremendous deficit of over $2,000,000,000.

The second avenue out of this depression is to call a conference of the nations of the world and stabilize the price of silver as a world medium of exchange. With France and America on the gold basis and the rest of the world dealing in silver, it is up to America to find an outlet for the 40 per cent surplus of goods in this country.

The other nations of the world can not buy from us and settle their trade balance in silver; and if they can not buy, inasmuch as practically all the gold of the world is cornered by the United States and France, we will continue to maintain a surplus of goods in this country. With no money to purchase goods from us, and if they had the money with the present tariff rates so high that it is practically an embargo on goods manufactured abroad, this country can not sell our goods to foreign nations if they can not sell us.

It is unfair and unjust to place an additional burden on the backs of the Federal employees. If there ever was a supurb example of double taxation, it would be in case the appropriation bills of the departments were cut, then a reduction in wages, along with the income tax at the end of the year.

Why, one gentleman said yesterday that every corporation had reduced wages time and again. Yes; I heard a report to-day that the carpenters had been reduced from $11 a day to $8 a day. Have you an employee to-day in any department of the Government who is receiving $11 a day? If there is, you could reduce his pay; but you are to reduce the pay of men working for $125 or $150 a month.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken may have personal reasons for feeling that the people have no confidence in Congress. I feel there is no justification for a statement like that.

This Economy Committee richly deserves the thanks of Congress. I am unable to recall when a task more difficult and unpleasant has been placed on any committee, nor can I recall when any committee has responded with finer courage, finer loyalty, and finer devotion to the public service. [Applause.]

Personally, I favor what is known as the McDuffie plan in reduction of salaries, but I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that the time has now come when those who feel as I do should lend hearty indorsement to the proposal submitted by the President. [Applause.]

The thing that has commended the study and preparation of this bill by the Economy Committee has been the splendid nonpartisan spirit shown by its members throughout their deliberations on the many important matters considered. I like the fine spirit that the President manifested toward the committee and the splendid and considerate attitude shown by the chairman of that committee to the President's suggestions.

I am not in accord with all the recommendations submitted by the committee in its report, but permit me to say this in the short time remaining, that no member of the Appropriations Committee will say that we have not too many employees on the pay roll of the Government. No one will deny that some are overpaid. Probably some may be underpaid, but so long as you retain too many on the pay roll, as pointed out by some of the learned Senators, you can never hope to adjust Government pay on a fair basis to those who are deserving.

I am astounded that gentlemen will rise and claim we are seeking to do an injustice to those now on the pay roll of the Government. There are no persons so fortunate and none so secure in their positions as those drawing pay from the Federal Government, whether they are drawing less or more than a thousand dollars, and the time it seems to me is at hand when everyone interested in the Government should be willing to make some reasonable contribution out of what he receives from his Government to help in this hour when we are striving to balance income and expenses.

I never indulge in personal recriminations in discussing differences as to matters before the committee or before the House. I recognize the right of every Member to differ from me—conceding to all sincerity and honesty as to their opinions and judgments. My one hope is that during the remainder of this session every proposal seeking to increase an appropriation will be followed by a yea-and-nay record vote, and that likewise every proposal that seeks to reduce the expenses of Government will be followed by a like record vote. This is one time when the people who sent us here have the right to know how their Representatives have voted on all items affecting Government expenses. Believing that Members are actuated by conscientious convictions, I hope that all votes on the many important provisions of this bill will be yea-and-nay record votes when the same is reported back to the House. [Applause.]

in the week and 80,000 be idle or that 480,000 shall work 5 days in the week and everyone be employed. The figures may not be precise, but they well enough show the question. Shall 400,000 employees of the United States work 6 days and 80,000 be added to the ranks of the unemployed, or shall you give them all employment through some part of the week, five-sixths of the week, 5 days in the week? Let every man realize the full import of his decision on this motion. If he votes against this motion, he votes that 80,000 of his fellow citizens shall be thrown on charity, if they have not resources of their own. It is estimated that there are four and a half of our people to every family, so that if it be that 80,000 are thrown out of employment, your vote in the negative will have disclosed you as willing to affect adversely the sustenance, to some extent the very life, of 360,000 human beings. Your vote "no" against this amendment will tell the country you believe it is better that every person who has the good fortune to stay on the pay roll shall enjoy all of the emoluments now his or hers without one penny of sacrifice and that there be turned over to the mercies of charity some part of those who number 80,000, together with their wives and their children. There may be cases where other members of the family are employed, some who can for a time exist on their savings, but it is not an exaggeration to say that, including the members of the families without resources, at least 200,000 of your fellow beings will be reduced to penury and want if this motion should not in the end prevail. It contemplates, to be sure, that there shall be some sacrifice by those now employed. Do they know what their complaint means?

God forbid that they know what they are doing when they throng our offices, or themselves send or incite others to send their telegrams and letters by the thousands, begging us to keep them secure to the last dollar of money and the last hour of work while one man of every six in this country is out of a job. When poverty swarms through the land, when fear stalks in every street, these protected and sustained employees of the Government are pouring on us a deluge of appeals to save them from the slightest sacrifice while their associates to the number of 80,000 are to be thrown out on the pavement, to be deprived of their livelihood by legislation, not in this bill but in the appropriation bills already passed, and by those remaining, as it is expected they will be when they reach the President for signature. The mischief has been done or may be done, but not by this bill. This motion presents not a choice between one method and another, but a choice between the method herein proposed and what the Congress has already done in its appropriations, and what it is expected it will do.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As to the result of a cut, assuming it will go through both Houses, how accurate are the figures now being quoted by the gentleman?

Mr. LUCE. I take the figures as just read by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON]. I rely on his accuracy in the matter.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are supplied by the Budget, and it is the best estimate they can get.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman know how they figured it?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They figured upon the theory that the Senate would reduce 10 per cent below the House.

Mr. LUCE. I am sorry that I can not yield any more time. It makes no difference as to your vote whether it is 80,000 or 70,000 or 60,000 or 50,000. A vote against this motion is a vote to throw many thousands of Americans on charity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I noticed in this morning's press reports where President Hoover in Richmond yesterday at the governors' conference urged that greater economy be demonstrated in carrying on the work of the States. I want to bring to the attention of the House and the Nation what my own State did in the legislature which has just adjourned. The State recognizes the necessity for decreased governmental expenditures, just as much as the Congress recognizes it. I want to give the figures showing just what our legislature has done with reference to reduction of salaries of State employees. According to figures furnished me by a member of the judiciary committee of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of South Carolina, salaries up to and including $1,000 are reduced 10 per cent; salaries ranging from $1,000 to $1,250 are reduced 15 per cent. Those ranging from $1,250 to $1,600 are decreased 16⅔ per cent; those from $1,600 to $1,800 will receive a reduction of 20 per cent; those from $1,800 to $2,100 are reduced 25 per cent; those from $2,100 to $2,400, 26 per cent; from $2,400 to $2,700, 27 per cent; from $2,700 to $3,000, 30 per cent for the next year. Those receiving over $5,000 have been decreased 33⅓ per cent.

These men back home realize the necessity for a decrease in governmental expenditures, and they tell me it costs just as much for a man in my State to live, whether he is carried on the pay roll of the State or whether he is carried on the pay roll of the Federal Government.

The school-teachers of my State, who are charged with the responsibility and duty of training the future citizenship of this country, are required to work on an average salary of a thousand dollars or less a year, have had to take a reduction of 12½ per cent in their salaries in order for the State to meet its budget. If employees in the various States are required, on account of this depression, to take reduction in salaries, I am convinced there is grave necessity for a reduction of expenditures in the Federal Government, because the people who pay the taxes to run the State government must pay the taxes to run the Federal Government.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I am sorry, but I do not have time. I have only five minutes.

There are 6,000 or more of these teachers who will have their salaries reduced 12½ per cent, and even then they are not paid promptly with money, but in many cases paid only with scrip. Why? The taxes have not been collected. Why? The people are not able to pay them. The States can not go out and levy taxes like this great Federal Government of ours.

There can be no doubt but what the States are expecting the Government to decrease Federal expenditures somewhat in proportion to the decreases already made in many of the State, county, and municipal governments. Personally, I do not favor all the provisions of either one of the plans suggested—the McDuffie plan or the Ramseyer plan. I think instead of having a flat reduction on all salaries the decreases should be graduated. That is, they should be in proportion to the amount of the salary drawn somewhat similar to the figures I have already recited as having been approved by the legislature of my State. In other words, I think as the salaries increase from the lower brackets there should be an increased reduction. I am satisfied if these reductions are fair and reasonable, there will be no objection on the part of the Federal employees. As a matter of fact, practically everyone who has conferred with me with reference to these reductions has indicated that he is willing to take a fair and reasonable reduction provided such reductions were uniform and do not discriminate in favor of one against another. For example, I do not think it will be fair to reduce the salary of rural letter carriers in the same proportion as other Federal employees and then in addition take away their allowance and maintenance. I believe their salaries, however, should be reduced in the same proportion as others whose salaries are similar.

I disagree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], who says there should be no reduction in salaries.

I realize there will be some hardship, but governmental revenues are decreasing every day, and I know if there is no reduction in the outgo and there is a gradual and constant decrease in the income that sooner or later there will be governmental bankruptcy. I think it was Poor Richard who said, in effect, that if you continue to take meal from the barrel without putting any in, you will soon come to the bottom. The same principle will apply to a government. The only way it is possible to increase income is to increase the taxes, and they are so high now that people can not stand to be further burdened. In my opinion, you will never balance the Budget until governmental expenditures are drastically reduced. A little reduction here and there will not amount to anything. Big items must be reduced by lopping off big sums.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, it is true that whatever plan may be adopted with respect to compensation of Federal employees, certain injustices will be effected. Still, since one of the plans has been, in large part, emasculated, there is but one thing left for us to do, namely, to analyze fairly and honestly the substitute which has been offered.

It should commend itself to us for several reasons. First, because it inaugurates, in principle, at least, the 5-day week. I think almost every Member of the House will agree with the statement that eventually, by reason of the technological advances which have been made during the course of the last decade, this country must go to a shorter work week than any we have heretofore experienced. The second reason why this plan should commend itself to us is that if certain changes are made in the language of the substitute, it offers a medium by which those who would otherwise be thrown out of employment as an incident to the cuts which the Senate has made and contemplates making may be absorbed. This substitute, then, finally resolves itself into a cut imposed upon the salaries of Federal employees by reducing the time for which they are paid, so that two things may be accomplished: First, the absorption of those who would otherwise be thrown out of employment, and, secondly, effecting economies consistent with a reasonable policy of retrenchment.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I favor the substitute. I shall support it. [Applause.] This is no time for any of us to participate in partisan politics, to take pride in authorship, to reject one plan because it may not have been ours, to go into great detail in considering the minutia of certain plans which perhaps did not originate with one or the other of us. This is a time, Mr. Chairman, when we must face our responsibilities, when we must reduce expenditures in Government, when we must discharge our duties here as Members of this House, regardless of where the credit may fall or the responsibility be placed. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's opinion and his intelligence. I would like to ask the gentleman this question seriously: If the Ramseyer plan is amended so as to place an exemption above or below $2,500, which of the two plans would the gentleman then prefer?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That is a difficult question to answer. On the face of it, I would favor the substitute which has been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] but reserve, however, the right to change my mind after more mature consideration. On the face of it, however, that is my answer.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to discuss the pending motion.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri to the amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER:

On page 1, line 9, strike out "10/11" and insert in lieu thereof "21/22."

On page 2, line 5, strike out the words "without compensation" and insert "with compensation at one-half the rate of compensation of such officer or employee."

On page 2, line 24, strike out the word "all" and insert "except as provided in Sec. 101 (b) all."

On page 4, line 18, strike out the figure "8.3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "5."

On page 4, line 23, strike out "8.3" and insert "5."

On page 5, strike out lines 15 to 17, both inclusive, and insert: "annum, but not more than $2,500 per annum shall be reduced by 5 per cent, but not below a rate of $1,500 per annum; if more than $2,500 per annum, such retired pay shall be reduced by 10 per cent but not below a rate of $2,375 per annum."

On page 6, line 17, strike out "3/8" and insert "3/4."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The second paragraph of the amendment, if I understood correctly, changed the word "without," in the fifth line of page 2, to the word "with," making it read "with compensation." Following the ruling the Chair made a while ago, this being an economy bill and the amendment raising the expenditure, the amendment would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order if there is any doubt in the Chairman's mind.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard if there is any doubt in the Chairman's mind.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. I think the amendment in its present form is cruel, to say the least. The amendment I offer still provides for the 30-day furlough plan, but it requires the Government to pay the salary for 15 days while the employee is forced to take 15 days leave without pay.

Looking at the amendment alone, if one does not understand the situation, he no doubt would be warranted in criticizing a Member who declines to support it. You can not, however, consider this amendment alone. You must consider at the same time other provisions in the bill affecting the Government employee's salary. There are in this bill, as I have repeatedly stated, no less than six provisions, each of which reduces the salary of the Government worker. Would you reduce the salary of a man receiving the maximum salary in the Postal Service over $500? Would you take $500 away from a man receiving $2,000? A legitimate salary reduction is one thing, but a wholesale salary reduction is another. If you stopped with this amendment, you could pass it without trouble by a large majority; but you do not do so. In this title and the next title you find provisions, six in all, each and every one taking something from the pay of the Government clerk. If a business man reduces the wages of his employees, he reduces the wages and stops. But here you reduce the salary and further reduce it in six separate instances. No matter who the business man is that wants salaries reduced, I am sure if he fully understood this situation he would not give it his approval. He would say, "Reduce the salaries, and stop there."

Why, when this proposition was originally offered it provided to take one month's pay, in some instances $33, from the pay of the enlisted men in the Army and Navy, and anywhere from $45 to $65 from the annual pay of the charwoman who receives about $450 or $650 a year. Now, who, I ask, would approve of such a reduction?

The first amendment was to exempt those receiving $1,000 and over. Then an amendment to reduce those receiving $1,200 and over, and now we have the President's plan, the Ramseyer amendment, changed again so that all those who receive $1,500 and over are affected. This last change was made since the amendment was printed. I did not know it was changed until a few minutes ago.

Now, for the benefit of some of you gentlemen who have not studied this proposition very carefully, and especially those coming from the rural sections, let me tell you substantially what it does to your rural carrier. The average pay of your rural carrier is $2,017. He is required to furnish an automobile, to keep that automobile in repair, to supply the gas to run it, and to replace it from his own funds when it is worn out, for which he receives an average of $383 a year in the form of an allowance based upon mileage.

Under the provisions of the Ramseyer amendment, and I take the average pay for allowance, the carrier is only to be allowed three-eighths of the present amount that is being paid for the upkeep of his automobile and its replacement when it is worn out, or $144, a loss of $239, which is equal to 10 per cent of his pay as well as his allowance; and, plus that, he loses his annual leave, for he gets no leave. This is a saving to the Government, for if the rural carrier receives annual leave some one must deliver the mail and be paid for it.

Under my amendment he will lose $96 of his present allowance, but he also loses his annual leave, as I have not changed that. Ninety-six dollars and loss of all vacation is rather a fair contribution for one man getting on an average of $2,017. Remember it costs him money to run his car.

There are 27,895 employees getting $1,500 a year; 31,000 getting $1,600 per year; 21,000 getting $1,700 per year; 42,000 getting $1,800 per year; and 33,000 getting $1,900 per year. Each and every one in the groups I have mentioned will lose one full month's pay under the Ramseyer amendment. He also suffers other losses, the postal clerks being hit six times.

I meet the situation which the gentleman from Arizona mentions.

I do not disturb the 30 days' annual leave, but I cut the amount that will be deducted from the pay. Under my amendment the employee loses 15 days' pay, under the Ramseyer amendment 30 days' pay.

They have changed this amendment so often, I can not intelligently inform the House how much it will save, but it will be about $40,000,000. If the Government employees contribute $40,000,000 toward the deficit, it appears to me they will be doing their part. But, aside from this, as I said before, when you get to Title II there you will find numerous provisions that further affect the salary of the Government employee. Think of what you will do in Title II to the employees when you vote on my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should not yield; my time is limited; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I will say to the gentleman that I will get more time for him. I would like to know what his amendment means. That is the reason I want to ask the gentleman this question. Is the effect of the gentleman's amendment to cut the savings of the Ramseyer amendment in two?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely; that is the effect of my amendment, to cut the savings of the Ramseyer amendment in two. If the Ramseyer amendment will not turn the employees of this Government out in the street, as he says, and I hope he is right, then my amendment will not, because I provide for 30 days' furlough with one-half pay, while the Ramseyer amendment takes one month's pay and provides for 30 days' furlough.

Mr. Chairman, just as sure as we are here today, a shorter workday for all who work is coming. It must come to provide employment for the millions idle the past few years. I have stated time and again that five days of work a week for all is just around the corner.

Machinery, time-saving devices, has brought about a condition that must be remedied; and if you do not do away with the machines, then you must provide, and business must provide, for a 5-day week.

It is true as the gentleman says the 30-day furlough plan will mean that tens of thousands will not be turned out on the streets without positions. That is why I do not disturb the 30-day furlough plan.

I want as many to remain at work as it is possible to retain. Over 100,000 Government employees are going to lose their jobs as it is. Why increase the number? This Congress before it adjourns is going to reduce Government expenditures between six hundred and nine hundred million dollars. I think the taxpayers will be satisfied with such a record. I certainly hope the members of the committee will give some thought to the other amendments in this bill which are going to affect employees besides the salary proposition when they vote on my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri. The gentleman has frankly stated that if this amendment is adopted it means cutting in two the proposal offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

I have not been in accord with the proposed reduction. This committee had as many ideas as there were members on it with reference to the pay cut.

In passing I wish to say that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] has sacrificed more in opinion in order to save the Government money than anybody on that committee. [Applause.]

I was in favor of a straight pay cut, but that is passed. We can not talk about that any more. If the program is carried out as now proposed, there will be but a saving of $10,000,000 under this pay cut, and the proposal which was carried this afternoon reduces it $9,000,000 more, leaving $1,000,000. Who among you is prepared to go home to your people and say that in this period of distress you were only willing to cut $1,000,000 off the pay roll of the United States that totals more than a billion dollars?

Now, I want to emphasize what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts when he said that unless the program now before us, as embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] is adopted, 80,000 people will be turned out on the streets. That is just half the equation. If the Ramseyer proposal is adopted, in addition to keeping these 80,000 people employed, it will save $65,000,000 to the Treasury of the United States. So it helps both ways.

We have all promised our people to reduce governmental expenses. If we are going to do it, now is the time. We will never have such another opportunity.

Yesterday, speaking on the rule, I said that unless the program proposed by this committee is adopted, there would be no economy voted by this Congress. Some one said, "How do you know?" The best evidence as to how I know has been given by the action of this House on yesterday and to-day in striking out more than $60,000,000 that should have been saved to the Government. There is not a single item in this bill but what will receive just as much opposition as is now being proposed against the salary cut.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not understand the logic of the gentleman and other gentlemen who have spoken when they assume that the committee plan has actually been eliminated. I want to call the gentleman's attention and the attention of the committee to the fact that when we get back into the House we will have a roll call on it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say that there is no discord between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself; and I wish to say further that from the beginning of the consideration of this bill to this very hour, there never has been a semblance of political bias in the consideration of any of these questions, and, as he says, opportunity will be afforded when we get back in the House to correct the mistakes that have been made.

Mr. BYRNS. We have the right to vote on these amendments under the rule, so that this question is not eliminated by any means.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I think we have had enough debate on this proposition. I make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that debate is closed on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that an amendment to the substitute would certainly be in the third degree.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would have the right, after the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri is voted down, to then offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the Chair bear with me just a moment? Under the rule the amendment brought in by the Committee on Economy is considered as an original bill under the 5-minute rule. The gentleman from Missouri has offered a substitute—the Chair is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri and Mr. RAMSEYER.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 118, noes 172.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2 of the Ramseyer amendment, line 17, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2 of the Ramseyer amendment, line 17, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,500."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am sure if the House had fully understood the meaning of the Cochran amendment, it would have been adopted. The Cochran amendment would have given us the opportunity of establishing a 5-day week basis without putting all of the burden on the shoulders of the employee.

Under the rule, the Cochran amendment having been voted down, I offer my amendment to raise the limit to $2,500, so as to permit us to inaugurate the 5-day week, thereby setting an example to industry and commerce of the necessity of shortening the working day and the working week.

A great deal has been said in the course of this debate about balancing the Budget of the Government. The only way and the only time that the Government's Budget will be balanced is when the family budget of a hundred million American families will be balanced. As long as you have unbalanced family budgets, you are going to have an unbalanced Government Budget.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, how is the gentleman going to take care of all the employees who will be thrown out of work by reason of the Senate reduction? There are bound to be a lot of people thrown out on the streets by reason of that action.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am one who voted against the Department of Interior 10 per cent reductions when it came from the Senate, and I have a right to talk about it; but I am sorry that many of my colleagues on this side of the aisle closed their eyes and were stampeded into voting for it. I will also add that all the facts, the destructive results of such a vote, was called to the attention of the House. Of course, we can not have any semblance of government or normal functioning of the departments if the House blindly cuts 10 per cent, and then again submits another bill and blindly votes to reduce salaries. I repeat—I have said it so many times I know I may be becoming tiresome—this wage reduction is not a question which affects the Government employees at all. The Federal employee wage cut is only incidental to the whole wage-scale question and the standard of living in this country. Again, let me repeat at the risk of becoming tiresome, within a very few days we shall be called upon to consider a bill brought in by the Committee on Banking and Currency permitting the inflation of currency in order to increase commodity prices of 1926. How can we, I appeal to your common sense, talk about reducing salaries and increasing commodity prices at the same session of Congress. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, please listen to the amendment I have offered. It eliminates from the reduction of the furlough plan salaries of $2,500 and it permits the staggering system so much talked about by the President of the United States.

In his message of December 3, 1929, he said:

I have therefore instituted systematic, voluntary measures of cooperation with the business institutions and with State and municipal authorities to make certain that fundamental business of the country shall continue as usual that wages shall not be reduced and therefore the purchasing power shall not be reduced.

Again in that message he says:

I am convinced that by these measures we have reestablished confidence, that wages should remain stable.

Again the President in his message to the governors appealed for the stabilization of wages.

I submit, gentlemen, we can not blindly and without consideration simply vote down the salaries and the standards, and I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I know he is sincere, I know he has worked hard, but I appeal to the gentleman that this does not stop at the Federal employee. This is going to spread throughout the country.

Every day I receive letters from employers urging a cut of Federal salaries and frankly stating that they expect to reduce the pay of their employees as soon as the salaries of Government employees are reduced.

I say this is not the kind of criterion on which we should base legislation. Gentlemen, this bill may be jammed through by the shameful propaganda that is being spread around the country, but it is wrong, it is unfair, and it is economically unsound.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I explained fully to you the situation when I was before you last night. I appeal to you now to help hold this furlough plan intact. If you are against the plan, if you are against both plans, you can vote against them in the final wind-up; but what we are trying to do now is to hold this economical and humane plan intact.

If you raise the exemption to $2,500, it means that you exempt most everybody; in the Postal Service you exempt practically all. Very few would be left.

I want to appeal especially to the Members of this House who are not from the large cities; and the attack on the bill last night and to-day comes from Members representing the large cities—they do not understand our problems in the rural regions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And you do not understand ours.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I want to remind Members from the country districts of the situation back home. Taxpayers in every county in the Middle West have held meetings protesting against public expenditures, including salaries. How many clerks outside of the Government service, in Iowa and Illinois and Missouri, are getting as much as $1,500 a year? How many in Alabama? We are up against the serious situation, and we want to meet it in the most economical and humane way possible.

Of the two plans, I favor this furlough plan. We did not succeed in preserving the other plan from emasculation yesterday. The intention was to have both plans in good shape when the final showdown came and then have them voted upon. That is to give you the choice between two well-worked-out plans. The furlough plan is the more humane and has greater saving. The Cochran amendment, if adopted, would double the number of unemployed.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman misunderstands me. I did not say you said it. I say that cutting in two the leave without pay would mean that many more would be thrown out of employment. The Government would be unable to retain them. Here is a humane plan. Many industries have put it into effect already. Here is an establishment that has not got enough work for men to work six days a week, not for all of them, and adopts a 5-day week to take care of all of them. By the 5-day plan we retain more in employment with less pay for each employee, but the number of unemployed is reduced.

Now, gentlemen, help us to preserve this amendment. If you are against it, help us anyway. If you are against the pay cut at the close, step up like a man and vote against it. But do not emasculate one plan to-day and then emasculate the other plan to-morrow, which is merely to destroy. This is a time for constructive action, and we ought to do our best to meet this unusual situation that confronts us. [Applause.] We can do it by carrying out this plan, which is humane and economic.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is enthusiastic, and has been talking about the city and the country. Why did he put the rural free delivery carriers in the preferred class?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The rural carriers in my amendment are not in a preferred class.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And only save an infinitesimal amount.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The rural carriers are getting more of a cut than the city carriers.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is exhausted under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 2, line 17, after the word "of," strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,400."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the House made its decision with regard to wage cuts. We determined after considerable debate, calm deliberation, and mature judgment that there should be no pay cuts to the employees of the Federal Government whose salaries were $2,500 or less. To-day we come in and reverse that decision, and not only that but instead of inflicting a pay cut of $150 we double that amount, for this substitute is no more and no less than a pay cut of $300 on the average Federal employee and the postal worker. Many arguments have been advanced for and against this proposition. I shall discuss the arguments made in favor of it.

It is said that it gives work to substitutes. Then, also, that it saves money for the Government, that it gives more work and at the same time saves more money. Then, that it will keep 80,000 men at work, make their employment more secure, and at the same time they say we are threatened by reason of the appropriation program of the Senate with the absolute dismissal and discharge of vast numbers of employees in the service. It certainly can not do all these things.

If it is held that it will save $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in the Post Office Department alone, and then the Appropriations Committee at the other end of the Capitol cuts $80,000,000 from the Post Office appropriation bill, how are you going to put more substitutes to work, and how will you save the men involved in this bill? You do nothing by this proposal except to cut $300 from every employee of the postal department, and you go down as low as $1,500 in order to reach the lower-paid worker. Why, it is a severe blow to the rural letter carriers, because while we exempted them on yesterday, we cut their equipment pay to-day by $300. This is a wage reduction, nothing else. This will disturb the differential that exists in the Postal Service to-day. This bill will destroy the service, for by it you give the Postmaster General authority to work a railway mail clerk as a postal laborer and at the same time to work a postal laborer as a railway mail clerk. It will create chaos in a well-organized, well-balanced service of the Government, and I believe, if we were within our rights in voting an exemption up to $2,500 yesterday, to save $150 for the employees of the Federal service, we certainly are doubly right if we vote against this substitute proposition, which will penalize every man in the service double that amount. This substitute amendment should go out of the bill, if we are fair with ourselves and consistent with our previous actions. We will vote down the furlough plan. [Applause.]

The committee, on page 12, section 207, has recommended the suspension of the night-work pay differential, as well as overtime pay and higher pay for Sunday and holiday work. Postal employees do not receive pay for Sunday or holiday work, except for the last three Sundays in the year when Christmas work prevents lay-offs. Instead of pay they are granted compensatory time off for Sunday and holiday work. It is not known therefore, to what extent, if any, this provision will affect postal employees.

But the suspension of the night-work pay differential will adversely affect 50,000 clerks, railway mail clerks, and other employees. To them it means a double penalty—they will lose their 10 per cent night-work pay and, in addition, the pay reduction provided in the bill. This is manifestly unfair, grossly discriminatory against a group that has the least desirable assignment in the Postal Service—namely, night work.

It is inconceivable that Congress will knowingly penalize the postal night workers—the hardest-worked group in the service—by a 21 per cent pay reduction as against a smaller reduction for higher-paid groups enjoying better assignments. No postal employee is on night work from choice. It is an obvious injustice to make him the victim of a double penalty, as is proposed in the bill.

The committee has added this language to section 207:

In so far as practicable, overtime work and night work shall be performed by sustitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a day's work during the day during which the overtime work or night work is to be performed, and work on Sundays and holidays shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a week's work during the same week.

Apparently this is intended as a sop to the substitutes who were thrown out of work by the drastic reduction in the appropriation bill. Having taken their work away, we make a gesture toward restoring some of it. I say "gesture" because this language is meaningless as far as the Postal Service is concerned. I ask the committee to point out how a single substitute, over and above those now occasionally employed at night, can be put to work as a result of this provision?

Is it intended to lay off a regular clerk working nights to employ a substitute? Night work in the Postal Service is largely mail distribution performed by trained, skilled distributors. These men do not work also during the day. Their 8-hour tour in most instances is entirely at night. Now, is it intended to displace them by substitutes? I ask the committee to enlighten the House on this point. Please inform us how night work can be performed by substitutes to any greater extent than at present. In my judgment, this language as it relates to night work is meaningless so far as the Postal Service is concerned.

The language is superflous also, so far as overtime in the Postal Service is concerned, because existing law reads:

That in cases of emergency, or if the needs of the service require, and it is not practicable to employ substitutes, special clerks, clerks and laborers in first and second class post offices, and carriers in the City Delivery Service can be required to work in excess of eight hours per day, and for such overtime service they shall be paid on the basis of the annual pay received by such employee.

Please note that under the law at present regulars can not be employed on overtime in the Postal Service if it is practicable to employ substitutes. So this provision in its relation to postal overtime is a restatement of the present law and will not help the postal substitutes.

The third proposition, namely, that substitutes be employed on Sundays and holidays, will help the substitutes to some extent. But it will not result in an economy. The Post Office Department has administrative authority now to employ substitutes on Sundays and holidays in lieu of regulars. This practice was recently discontinued by the department because of its cost. It is cheaper to employ the regular and give him time off later at a slack period than to employ a substitute. That is the department's practice. At any rate, how are you to provide work for regulars with an $80,000,000 cut in the annual supply bill?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the Ramseyer amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the very same reasons exist for voting down this amendment that existed for voting down the previous amendment. The result of this amendment will be that out of a total pay roll of $1,315,000,000, only the sum of $300,000,000 will be affected with pay cuts. In other words, less than 10 per cent of the employees will be affected by the cut if this amendment should be voted into the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What will be the saving?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The saving if this amendment goes into the bill will be less than $20,000,000. I called attention a while ago to the fact that unless this staggering plan is adopted by Congress you are going to lose 18,000 city letter carriers, 9,000 second-class clerks in the post office, 8,000 rural carriers, and 1,609 assistant postmasters. If you adopt this amendment, you will reduce that loss by less than 10 per cent. It would be most unfortunate to force 70,000 employees out upon the street, most of whom can be saved under the staggering plan. Not only can they be saved, but the service which they render, which I am sure you do not wish to destroy, can be continued. I know of no service rendered by the Government that is more appreciated than the delivery of mail for rural and urban communities. Service to the folks back home should be some inducement to the plan proposed by the President.

The basic pay will not be destroyed and the principle of the 5-day week will be recognized by the Government.

The amendment should be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a minute and a half or two minutes time yet remaining. I would like to use that in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to offer an amendment, but he can only consume that time by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one and one-quarter minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is to amend the amendment now on the Clerk's desk so as to read $2,000 rather than $2,400.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would be in the third degree. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were—ayes 96, noes 146.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not prevent any Member from offering an amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Ohio: Page 4, line 15, strike out "10 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "20 per cent."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 35, noes 144.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN:
Page 1, line 7, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."
Page 2, line 14, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."
Page 2, line 17, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."
Page 3, line 5, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."
Page 4, line 22, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."
Page 5, line 16, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would like to know whether or not the Chair will continue to recognize Members to offer amendments. We could probably have 50 more amendments offered, and it seems to me we have pretty well gotten an expression of the House. I suggest to the Chair that amendments might be offered until 5 or 6 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be absolutely in the province of the committee so long as the amendments are germane.

Mr. BLANTON. And not dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

The question was taken; and a division was demanded by Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. BRITTEN and Mr. RAMSEYER to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 148 and noes 143.

So the amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as amended.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was not on his feet seeking recognition. The amendment comes too late.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I sent it to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not ask for recognition. I am sure if the gentleman had observed, the Chair waited before he put the motion on the Ramseyer substitute, and looked around the Chamber to see if any other Members desired to offer amendments.

The question is on the adoption of the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'CONNOR) there were—ayes 151, noes 125.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. O'CONNOR and Mr. RAMSEYER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 159 and noes 176.

So the substitute amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER was rejected.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Page 2, line 17, as amended, after "$2,500," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "up to and including $3,500; 15 per cent of the amount thereof up to and including $5,000; 20 per cent up to and including $7,500; and 25 per cent in excess of $7,500."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we all appreciate the great efforts that have been made by the Economy Committee in trying to reduce the expenses of the Government. I want to cut down expenses, discard useless departments, and combine departments wherever economy can be effected, and cut the salaries as they should be cut. This country is in a distressful condition; people are demanding reduction in expenses of the Government, and I am endeavoring to do my part.

I have opposed the reduction as proposed by the committee wherein it was 11 per cent of $1,000. I feel that the reduction should not go in the lower brackets, but that the greater reduction should go in the higher brackets.

You have already established a $2,500 exemption. To carry that out and to save expense my amendment makes 11 per cent applicable up to $3,500, inclusive; from $3,500 to $5,000, 15 per cent; from $5,000 to $7,500, 20 per cent; and over and above that amount 25 per cent. You must remember in making these reductions that you have a $2,500 exemption.

Let me call your attention to what this means. Under the present plan you would pay out $110 on a salary of $3,500. On a salary of $5,000 under the present plan there would be a reduction of $250; under the plan proposed in my amendment the reduction would be $335. On a salary of $7,500 under the plan proposed in my amendment the reduction would be $835, whereas the reduction under the present plan is $550. There being a $2,500 exemption, this increase would take from a $10,000 salary the amount of $1,460; $12,000 salary, $1,460, and so on. It follows out the idea embodied in the income tax law.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has answered the question I had intended asking. I have prepared an amendment providing a $2,000 exemption, then beginning with a 5 per cent reduction on that part of the salary between $2,000 and $3,000, 10 per cent between three and five thousand, 15 per cent between five and eight thousand, and 20 per cent on that part between eight and ten thousand and over. I agree with him that such cuts as are made should be larger in the higher brackets. This is the program that I shall support. As the gentleman's amendment is similar, I shall support it in this emergency.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. This merely makes an increase in the higher brackets, and that is where it ought to be. We ought to preserve and protect the man in the lower brackets, and we can do it in this way. The amendment will raise millions of dollars more if you are going to keep in the $2,500 exemption.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. What is the total amount of the saving under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I have not those figures.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the distinguished gentleman know that there are only 4,000 people drawing salaries greater than $5,000?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If there are more than 4,000 the saving will be that much greater.

Mr. SIROVICH. There are but 4,000.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They will be reduced under this plan. It is not fair to attack the man drawing a small salary. You can not deal with him as an individual, but you must deal with him as of a class. You know, and I know, that the greatest portion of these Federal employees live in cities and their living expenses are high. Under the present distressing conditions in the country they support many more people than those in their own families. Here in Washington I understand that many are aiding in supporting their relatives in the various States.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it the gentleman's purpose to save money for the Government or to protect the employees?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The purpose is to save money for the Government.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not save $15,000,000.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is better than you have left under this title in this bill.

What I would have preferred, and the amendment that I intended to offer, would have provided for no exemption, but it would have commenced something like $2,500 with a graduated scale, reaching 20 per cent in the higher brackets; and this method would have saved for the Government something like forty-five millions, so I am advised. However, that question has been settled and an exemption has been voted, and it is for that reason that I am asking this House to place a greater percentage reduction on the higher brackets. According to my ideas it is right, it is just, and it will save many millions of dollars to this Government; and I trust that this amendment can be adopted.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. If it were necessary to cut salaries, as we are talking about doing here, I would be for it. It not only is not necessary but it is absolutely unnecessary. It is bad economy; it is bad morals; and it is bad politics. The interest of the people of the cities and the interests of the people of the country in the United States are one and the same. [Applause.] It is not true to say that because a man lives in a country district he shall take a different view of the needs of the situation. I appeal to those of you who, like myself, are from a district containing very small cities, to consider that our interests are exactly the same as the interests of people who live in New York, Chicago, and every other great city in America. We are putting ourselves in a position where, in effect, we are saying that prosperity in the cities brings poverty in the country, or that prosperity in the country brings poverty in the cities. Any man who knows the simple A, B, C's of economics knows that is not true. The people of the cities and the people of the country will prosper together or suffer from poverty together.

From the very beginning we started at this thing backward.

Some gentlemen here seem to be amused at the present situation, but let me say to them that they are going to answer some questions this fall. They are not going to be able to get away with this when they go back home and face an old hard-headed farmer, and I am going to face my farmers, too. You may go back and say, "We have saved $150,000,000 or $300,000,000." Then the farmer will say to you, "How much have you saved for me? Did you save my home? Did you enable me to pay my taxes? Did you enable me to get good prices for my produce?" Then he will ask you again, "How much did you say you saved for me?"

If you will take your pencils, gentlemen, and count how much you have saved for these farmers you will find you are not saving for them a single, solitary dollar. I am preparing a table which will astound the gentlemen who really believe they are helping the farmers by this supposed economy.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. Does the gentleman favor this $2,500 cut or exemption in salaries?

Mr. KELLER. I am not going to vote for any cut in any man's salary anywhere or at any time. [Applause.] It is all wrong economically; absolutely wrong.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman permit an observation in his time?

Mr. KELLER. I will.

Mr. KVALE. To those Members of Congress who would like to know what the farm organizations and farm people think about pay cuts, I refer them to the RECORD of Tuesday, March 29, in which appear letters inserted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] from national farm leaders on this subject. They do not favor pay cuts.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman. I want to call your attention also to the fact that farm prices, commodity prices, and employment invariably go together. When employment starts downward commodity prices start downward. They go together. They go up, they run along together, and they go down together. If any man dares to go outside and debate this question with me where we can have time to talk things over as they ought to be, I will be able to put questions to him which he will be unable to answer. I should be glad to debate this subject before any farmer or labor audience with any man who believes our present program is at all defensible.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Labor, and he knows that this morning the contractor who has the contract for the Boulder Dam came in and said that as a result of the Interior Department appropriation bill cut, 3,200 men are to be completely turned out of work and the United States Government is to lose money during the next year on that project.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss to the amendment offered by Mr. MCREYNOLDS: Strike out all of the amendment down to and including the word "and" where it occurs the last time.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment offered by me will give the Members of the House an opportunity to express to the country whether they are willing to cut their own salaries in the higher brackets. This is the only purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to tax the patience of the committee at this late hour. I will try to finish in two minutes.

I want to say that I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] for the courage he demonstrated in the face of the discourtesy on the part of the committee, and I subscribe to every word he uttered.

I also wish to state at this time my firm conviction that it is not only an unwise and an ill-considered and an untimely, but an almost criminal policy on the part of the Congress at this time to reduce wages and to set such an example for business and industry throughout the country that inevitably will mean for every million dollars we save here in pay cuts, a billion dollar loss in purchasing power to the Nation at a time when we need purchasing power increased and restored.

I have my own views about reducing the salary of Members of Congress. I feel I do earn the net $5,000 annually that perhaps remains from my salary after I pay the necessary expenses incident to my work and after I try to conduct the cost of my own campaign independently. I have added cause for resentment when it comes to cutting the clerk hire, to making cuts in the stationery allowances that are now inadequate, and otherwise penalizing and crippling this legislative body and making it impossible for poor men or men of modest means to aspire to this office. [Applause.]

I think the constituents back in the country and at the crossroads, after they think this over, will doubt that Congress to-day is doing them any service by seeking such economies.

I feel these things deeply. As I study them I feel them more intensely. I am profoundly convinced that we are at the crossroads to-day, and that upon the action we are about to take when the debate on this measure is concluded will rest, not the dollars and cents we save for the taxpayers, but there will rest something far greater and of far more consequence—that which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and others have referred to—the very economic stability of the country and the recovery from the doldrums that we are now so unhappily in.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be rejected.

Mr. BACHMANN rose.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate has been exhausted on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on the question of congressional salary. I have some figures here of interest.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the same consideration is given to some one else for five minutes in favor of the amendment, I shall not object; otherwise I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know just what is the last amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the McReynolds amendment, as well as the Goss amendment to the amendment, read so that we may know where we are.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendments.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] may proceed for five minutes out of order and that following the gentleman from New York, I may proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. MCDUFFIE and Mr. PARKS objected.

The Clerk again read the Goss amendment and the McReynolds amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the McReynolds amendment carry the same reduction of congressional salary that the gentleman from Connecticut proposes in his amendment?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss) there were—ayes 31, noes 162.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee—in the McReynolds amendment strike out "$7,500" and insert "$17,500."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA to the amendment offered by Mr. MCREYNOLDS: Strike out "$7,500" where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof "$17,500."

Mr. MCDUFFIE. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. That amendment appears to me to be a dilatory amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not. I have a statement to make in reference to congressional salaries.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. I can not see where $17,500 will apply here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have our ambassadors.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the attorney for the Farm Board gets $17,500.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the reason I have taken this time is because there is so much misrepresentation and misapprehension on the part of a great many people in this country as to the high salaries of the Members of Congress and the luxurious life they are supposed to live here in Washington.

I do not blame the people for such misapprehension, when we have Members in the House, born with silver spoons in their mouths, who do not know the real value of a dollar, who vote every opportunity they have against the best interests of the working people, who get up here and make a grand-stand play by advocating a reduction of their colleagues' salaries.

The other day grandiloquent gestures were made, offering or suggesting amendments to reduce salaries of Members of Congress.

In order to get an accurate picture of the family economics of the average Member of Congress, I prepared a questionnaire which I sent to about one-half of the membership of the House taken at random. From the replies received I believe a fairly good cross-section of the average Congressional-family budget was obtained.

The additional burdens of the office, its obligations, and the expenses entailed by reason of maintaining two homes, are not generally known by the public and, though known by the critics of Congress, are entirely ignored. The information from the questionnaire indicates that the average rental paid by a Member of the House in Washington, D. C., is $138.81 a month. In addition to that, Members maintain their homes in their States, and the figures show that the average cost of maintenance is $1,002 a year, either for rent or taxes and upkeep of the home—a total of $222.31 per month for housing.

Much criticism has been made of the congressional mileage allowance. Yet the results of my questionnaire show that the average Member spends $399.41 a year for traveling expenses over the mileage allowance he receives from the Government. This includes, it should be added, money spent for traveling in his district and State during campaigns and between sessions.

Those Members of Congress who have children of school age (above the primary grade) report that the average additional cost of educating them is $547 per family per year higher by reason of the temporary and shifting residence in Washington.

I asked about the additional drain on congressional salaries by reason of contributions, donations, assessments, charities, and so forth, and found that the average was $900 a year.

The average annual cost of entertaining constituents in Washington is $440.61, and anyone familiar with conditions in Washington must know this is not an exaggerated figure. The amount represents the average Member who fulfills his political and social obligations modestly and necessarily, without splurge or extravagance.

While nearly all Members of Congress belong to some fraternal organization, very few are Members of so-called exclusive clubs, where initiation and annual dues are high.

In their answers my colleagues estimated their additional personal and family expenses due to official position and residence in Washington to average $374.65 a year.

Almost without exception, Members of Congress spend $300 or $400 per year above their stationery and postage allowances. It is a popular misconception that the franking privilege covers personal campaign mailing expenses. That is not true. A Representative's term is two years. He must meet a primary or election every other year, which entails large stationery and mailing expenses.

Mr. SIROVICH. How about food?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have not taken food into consideration. I have only taken the additional expenses imposed upon Members of the House by reason of their official position and residence in Washington. Any additional cost of food or clothes and local obligations would be included in the amount of $374.65 which I have previously quoted as being the additional personal and family expenses due to the official position and residence in Washington.

In addition to this, there are the campaign incidentals, apart from postage and traveling, which form a large drain. The conditions in different parts of the country and in different districts, as well as political local conditions, are so different that it is difficult to strike a fair mean average. The fact remains, nevertheless, that either in one form or in another there is this additional expense.

It is true that we have men of large fortunes who entertain lavishly here, but I have not taken such individuals into consideration as it would bring the incidental expenses above the average. As I stated before, some of these men are the very ones who are now shouting the loudest to reduce the salaries of the colleagues who come to Washington not for the social whirl but on a mission of civic duty for their constituents, for their State, and for their country.

It was not so long ago that many Members of Congress were falling so far behind in their normal expenses that many had to leave Congress and abandon their legislative work. The salary was increased by reason of the necessity of enabling Members of the House and Senate at least to make their family expenses and to live in some semblance of decency.

The matter of congressional salaries has always been under discussion. It is not so much as to what salary is paid an individual Member that is the cause of this constant criticism and these perennial attempts to reduce congressional salaries as it is the desire in some quarters to see either men of large fortunes only able to run for such office or to put in small men who would be susceptible to outside influences in legislating. It was not so long ago, before the popular election of Senators, that the United States Senate was nothing but a rich man's club. Before the popular election of Senators it was nothing unusual to see the presidents of large railroad corporations sitting in the United States Senate. Had it not become an American adage to say: "He can afford to be a United States Senator," or "He can afford to be a United States ambassador"? The American people soon learned that there were other qualifications than a vast fortune necessary for a United States Senator. For that reason the Constitution was changed and the popular election of Senators provided. The purpose of this drive and constant criticism of Congress and the attempts to reduce salaries is in keeping with the old policy of the special interests to control legislation.

Legislation has become a highly specialized work. It requires experience. It requires constant study of conditions and constant application to our legislative work. The demands on the legislator are constantly increasing. The number of problems in matters coming before Congress increases every year. I know that of the membership of this House the vast majority is unable to attend to any private business during the session of Congress.

I think it is only fair for the people to know that we live seven months in the year in Washington and we must maintain a residence in our home town; that we have certain obligations that go with our official duties, that we must devote all our time to those professional duties. Let us put an end to this demagogy. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago I offered an amendment to reduce the salaries of Members of Congress by 20 per cent. I offered that amendment in all sincerity and good faith. I am not one of those silver-spoon, silk-stocking aristocrats, to whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] referred a few moments ago. I live in one of the greatest industrial districts in the United States. I have just spent a week or 10 days in my home city. I find in that industrial district that about 20,000 workers are unemployed to-day. We have our soup houses and our bread lines. There has been a tremendous reduction all the way down the line in wages. In the office forces of our steel companies they have made reductions in the salary of the employees 40 per cent. The union men who had always worked under the union scale in that community have voluntarily accepted reductions, and I believe if Congress is going to take the position that it must reduce the salaries of Federal employees, there was nothing better it could do than to reduce its own salaries first. I know a Congressman is not getting paid too much, but these are critical times, and everybody in this country to-day has to make some sacrifice. It is going to take a lot of heroic sacrifice to get back to the position where we want to be.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. I voted for the Ramseyer amendment, and I tell you why. I voted for it because it established the principle of a shorter work week and a shorter work day.

In the district in which I live at the present time, if the steel plants were working 100 per cent capacity, we would still have 10,000 men unemployed. Why? We have expanded beyond all our dreams in industrial development with labor-saving devices and improved machinery, and 1 man working at an open-hearth plant in the steel plant to-day can produce in 12 hours the same tonnage that 20 men produced in the same length of time 25 years ago. One of our pipe mills can produce the same tonnage in one day that it took a week to produce 25 years ago. How are we going to remedy that? We have to establish a shorter work day and a shorter work week. I do not believe that employees are working too long hours to-day, but, in order to give these men employment, we must try to regulate our production to our capacity to consume; and we have to shorten the work day and the work week in order to spread this employment out over a wider, broader field.

I voted yesterday for the $2,500 exemption. I hesitate to reduce the salaries of the Federal employees in the lower brackets, but I take this moment to say to this House that when I introduced that amendment calling for a 20 per cent cut in the salaries of Congressmen I did it in all sincerity and honesty, because, as far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to make that sacrifice; and it would be a sacrifice to me to reduce my salary, but, in order to relieve the present situation and lighten the great burdens of taxation which weigh on the backs of the American people to-day, I am willing to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon Title I do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman moving that all debate on the title and all amendments thereto do now close?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman advise the House whether it is his intention now to continue without recess, or to have a recess from 6 o'clock to 7.30 o'clock, so that the Members can have time to get dinner.

Mr. McDUFFIE. My intention is not to have a recess, but to continue until 10 o'clock or 10.30 o'clock this evening.

Mr. SIROVICH. Then we all ought to walk out. There are some Members here who are sick.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the closing of debate on this title within a short time prevent us from offering further amendments to the title?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. BROWNING. But it will cut off debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that all debate upon Title I and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWNING) there were—ayes 161, noes 42.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIROVICH. There are many Members of Congress who have been worked to death. We are sick and tired of it. We have been working in our committee rooms, and I know that Members would like to have a recess for an hour or an hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to prefer a unanimous-consent request. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] has been trying to the best of his ability to get the floor on a bona fide amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will have a right to offer his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes in which to present his amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. SIROVICH and Mr. McDUFFIE to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 136, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 7.30 this evening.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The question was taken; and a division was demanded by Mr. SIROVICH.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SIROVICH and Mr. McDUFFIE to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 118 and noes 157.

So the motion was rejected.

RECESS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now stand in recess until 7.30 p. m.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 7.30 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAINEY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry to ask if the rules of the House of Representatives run to the committees of the House of Representatives? It is a question of the privileges of the House relating to procedure.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am rising to a question of procedure of the House of Representatives. I am going on the theory that the procedure of the House runs to the committees of the House. In that connection I desire to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman, the Chair will read the following from the rules:

> The rules of the House are hereby made the rules of its standing committees as far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is hereby made a question of high privilege in said committees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I desire to make a statement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no authority for making any statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am making a statement under the rule just read as to the privileges of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I submit it is subject to the same point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Am I not to be given a chance to rise to a question of privilege?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's statement is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the regular order is that the gentleman may state his question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I charge the rules of the House in the Committee——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman has a matter of privilege, let him state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If I may have order so I can be heard, I will state the matter of privilege, which is to the effect that I charge that the rules of the House——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the statement of the gentleman's question of privilege is not in order. A question of the privilege of the House can only be raised by the offering of a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Am I not to be allowed to rise in my seat on a question of the privileges of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Not unless the gentleman offers a resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I might state in explanation before the resolution is reported that it was placed in my hands this afternoon, and after conferring with the officers of the House I am advised that it is necessary to pass this resolution immediately on account of the short time intervening between now and the purposes of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 29

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Charles Brantley Aycock, presented by the State of North Carolina to be placed in Statuary Hall, is hereby accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State of North Carolina for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the high purpose of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of the State of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this one of the statues that the State of North Carolina is authorized to place in Statuary Hall and is this the usual resolution?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and this is the second statue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11267, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, just before we recessed I moved that all debate on Title I close. Since that time I have been reminded that in so far as I was concerned I would endeavor to secure permission for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] to offer an amendment. Preferring not to be placed in the attitude of breaking faith with a colleague, I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may present his amendment and have five minutes in which to address the committee upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there are other Members here—the gentleman from New York, Mr. DELANEY, the gentleman from New York, Mr. MEAD, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BEAM—who have important amendments to offer and on which they desire to be heard. It was not suggested that this whole Title I be foreclosed after the salary matters were disposed of, because there are other very important matters in that title, and it was the general opinion of the committee, as expressed just before we recessed, that a motion to foreclose all debate on those titles interfered with Members who desired an opportunity to present amendments.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is: Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it in order at the present moment to offer a substitute for Title I?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. There is an amendment pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet calling for a division on the adoption of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late. The Chair neither saw nor heard the gentleman when he put the question. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWNING: On page 7, line 1, strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEAM: Strike out section 102 (a) on page 2, lines 9 to 17.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DELANEY: Page 2, line 17, start after the figure and insert: "Provided, That any reduction in the compensation of any office, position, employment, or enlistment, the compensation for which is adjustable to conform to the prevailing rate of pay in private employment for similar work, shall not exceed the reduction in the total compensation of other employees of equivalent compensation, covered by this section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DELANEY) there were—ayes 46, noes 138.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: Page 7, line 4, after the period, insert a new paragraph:

"Par. (c) After June 30, 1932, no officer or employee of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall receive a salary at a rate in excess of $10,000 per annum."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I state the point of order to be that the salary which the gentleman seeks to reduce of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is already covered in the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is mistaken, and the chairman has just indicated that he will accept the amendment.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the chairman has no right to accept an amendment and say that the committee is not opposed to it.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOODRUM) there were—ayes 142, noes 54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: On page 4, line 3, add paragraph (f):

"Postal employees who will automatically be reduced in salary on July 1, 1932, by reason of decreased postal receipts for the calendar year 1931, and shall not apply to those who have been reduced on July 1, 1931, except wherein the total reduction applied on July 1, 1931, and July 1, 1932, does not amount to 11 per cent of original salary: And provided further, That the total reduction shall not amount to more than 11 per cent."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. We have already passed the postal employees' provision.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Also, Mr. Chairman, it is not germane.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEAD. I will withdraw the amendment if the chairman of the committee can inform me if the postal employee whose salary is regulated by receipts of the office——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, and the gentleman's inquiry is not in order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were—ayes 41, noes 118.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for Title I a real economy substitute which will save annually $500,000,000 to the badly battered Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I.—FURLOUGH OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

SEC. 101. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, each officer or employee in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol and the Bureau of Prohibition earning compensation on an annual basis at the rate of more than $2,000 per annum shall be furloughed without compensation for six calendar months——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment shows on its face that it is clearly dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment so far is in order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

or for such periods as shall in the aggregate——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, we are entitled to have the amendment read without interruption.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it is a lot of buncombe.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The whole bill is buncombe.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying now to determine whether or not the amendment is subject to a point of order. So far it is not subject to a point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

be equivalent to six calendar months, for which latter purpose 24 working days (counting Saturday as one-half day) shall be considered as the equivalent of one calendar month.

SEC. 102. In order to promote economy and reduce expenditures in the Treasury and Justice Departments and to relieve industries and subjects of taxation from existing and additional burdens, there shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, is dilatory, and foolish.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out Title I.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNERY: Strike out Title I.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was being taken, when Mr. CONNERY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. CONNERY and Mr. WILLIAMSON.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were 84 ayes and 183 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Title II.

The Clerk read Title II, as follows:

TITLE II.—PROVISIONS AFFECTING PERSONNEL

SUSPENSION OF PROMOTIONS AND FILLING OF VACANCIES

SEC. 201. All provisions of law which confer upon civilian or noncivilian officers or employees of the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia automatic increases in compensation by reason of length of service or promotion are suspended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933; but this section shall not be construed to deprive any person of any increment of compensation received through an automatic increase in compensation prior to July 1, 1932.

SEC. 202. No administrative promotions in the civil branch of the United States Government or the government of the District of Columbia shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933: Provided, That the filling of a vacancy, when authorized by the President, by the appointment of an employee of a lower grade, shall not be construed as an administrative promotion, but no such appointment shall increase the compensation of such employee to a rate in excess of the minimum rate of the grade to which such employee is appointed unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation. The President shall submit to Congress a report of the vacancies filled under this section up to November 1, 1932, on the first day of the next regular session. The provisions of this section shall not apply to commissioned, commissioned warrant, warrant, and enlisted personnel (including cadets) of the Coast Guard.

SEC. 203. No appropriation available to any executive department or independent establishment or to the municipal government of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, shall be used to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any civil position under the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia which is vacant on July 1, 1932, or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply (a) to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be authorized or approved in writing by the President of the United States, (b) to temporary, emergency, seasonal, or cooperative positions, or (c) to commissioned, commissioned warrant, warrant, and enlisted personnel (including cadets) of the Coast Guard. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended, for the period between July 1, 1932, and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session: Provided, That such impounding of funds may be waived in writing by the President of the United States in connection with any appropriation or portion of appropriation, when, in his judgment, such action is necessary and in the public interest.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT FOR AGE

SEC. 204. On and after July 1, 1932, no person rendering civilian service in any branch or service of the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia who shall have reached the retirement age prescribed for automatic separation from the service, applicable to such person, shall be continued in such service, notwithstanding any provision of law or regulation to the contrary: Provided, That no such person heretofore or hereafter separated from the service of the United States or the District of Columbia under any provision of law or regulation providing for such retirement on account of age shall be eligible again to appointment to any appointive office, position, or employment under the United States or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to any person named in any act of Congress providing for the continuance of such person in the service.

SEC. 205. The provisions of this act providing for temporary reductions in compensation and suspension in automatic increases in compensation shall not operate to reduce the rate of compensation upon which the retired pay of any officer or employee would be based but for the application of such provisions, but the amount of retired pay shall be reduced by the percentage applicable under Title I.

TEMPORARY REDUCTION OF TRAVEL ALLOWANCES

SEC. 206. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933—

(a) the traveling and per diem allowances provided for in sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the subsistence expense act of 1926, approved June 3, 1926 (U. S. C., Sup. V, title 5, secs. 823–826) shall not exceed the amounts of $5, $4, $6, and $5, respectively, in lieu of the amounts set forth in such sections;

(b) all provisions of law which authorize the payment of mileage to officers of the services mentioned in the pay adjustment act of 1922 (U. S. C., title 37) are hereby suspended and in lieu thereof such officers shall be entitled to allowances for travel only as provided for civilian employees of the Government, and the subsistence expense act of 1926, as modified by this section, shall apply to such travel: Provided, That all appropriations available for the payment of such mileage during the fiscal year 1933 shall be construed as being available for the payment of the allowances herein provided;

(c) the mileage allowance of Senators, Representatives in Congress, and the Delegate from Hawaii is reduced 25 per cent; the allowance to the Delegate from Alaska provided by section 1 of the act of May 7, 1906, the allowance of the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands provided by section 8 of the act of July 1, 1902, and the allowance to the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico provided by section 36 of the act of March 2, 1917, are reduced by 25 per cent; and

(d) the traveling allowances provided for in the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 633), shall not exceed $2 per day.

OVERTIME COMPENSATION

SEC. 207. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, no officer or employee of the Government shall be allowed or paid a higher rate of compensation for overtime work, for night work, or for work on Sundays and holidays. In so far as practicable, overtime work and night work shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a day's work during the day during which the overtime work or night work is to be performed, and work on Sundays and holidays shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a week's work during the same week.

LIMITATIONS ON AMOUNT OF RETIRED PAY

SEC. 208. (a) After the date of the enactment of this act, no person holding a civilian office or position, appointive or elective, under the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia or under any corporation, the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States, shall be entitled, during the period of such incumbency, to retired pay from the United States for or on account of services as a commissioned officer in any of the services mentioned in the pay adjustment act of 1922 (U. S. C., title 37) at a rate in excess of an amount which when combined with the annual rate of compensation from such civilian office or position makes the total rate from both sources more than $3,000; and when the retired pay amounts to or exceeds the rate of $3,000 per annum, such person shall be entitled to the pay of the civilian office or position or the retired pay, whichever he may elect. As used in this section, the term "retired pay" shall be construed to include credits for all service that lawfully may enter into the computation thereof.

(b) This section shall not apply to officers on the emergency officers' retired list created by the act of May 24, 1928, and shall not apply to any person retired for disability incurred in line of duty.

PERSONNEL REDUCTIONS—MARRIED PERSONS

SEC. 209. In any reduction of personnel in any branch or service of the United States Government or the District of Columbia, married persons (living with husband or wife) employed in the class to be reduced shall be dismissed before any other persons employed in such class are dismissed, if such husband or wife is also in the service of the United States or the District of Columbia. In the appointment of persons to the classified civil service preference shall be given to persons other than married persons living with husband or wife, such husband or wife being in the service of the United States or the District of Columbia.

TEMPORARY ASSIGNMENTS IN POSTAL SERVICE

SEC. 210. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, the Postmaster General may, when the interest of the service requires, temporarily assign any clerk to the duties of carrier or any carrier to the duties of clerk, and in an emergency may assign any post-office employee to the duties of a railway postal clerk, or any railway postal clerk to the duties of a post-office employee without change of pay-roll status.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. SIROVICH: Page 10, line 7, at the conclusion of section 204, add the following paragraph:

"Any civil-service employee who has to his credit 30 years or more of allowable service as computed under the provisions of the civil-service retirement act is hereby given the right of optional retirement without regard to age, and the act of May 2, 1920, as amended by act of May 27, 1930, is accordingly amended: Provided, That such applicant furnishes proof of disability of 20 per cent or more, as determined under the regulations of the Veterans' Administration."

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, one of the greatest American writers prior to and during the American Revolution was Thomas Paine. Four great works have made his name immortal in America, and established his fame throughout the civilized world. These four books are:

1. Common Sense; 2. The Crisis; 3. The Rights of Man; 4. Age of Reason.

"Common Sense" inspired and stirred the soul and imagination of George Washington to give his all upon the altar of establishing American freedom, and was instrumental in causing Thomas Jefferson to write that great immortal document known as the Declaration of Independence. When the American Colonial troops were in destitute circumstances, impoverished, suffering from hunger and want, walking, literally speaking, without shoes and in tattered clothes, it was the magnificent pamphlets called "The Crisis," written by Thomas Paine, that reinspired the American forces and those who sympathized with the American Revolution, to stand behind George Washington and the cause of the American Republic more than ever.

These 16 pamphlets called "The Crisis" were, next to the fighting spirit of Washington and his soldiers, more instrumental in bringing our cause to a successful conclusion than anything that ever happened in the eight years of strife between our Colonial forbears and the British redcoats.

In 1790 Edmund Burke wrote his treatise entitled "Reflections on the Revolution in France." In that book he genuflected and lick-spittled to monarchy and European aristocracy. It remained for that great intellectual genius, Thomas Paine, to answer him in that magnificent work entitled "The Rights of Man," in which he ridiculed the contentions of monarchies and aristocracies and all that they stand for, to battle for the inalienable right of mankind to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness, which every human being is entitled to receive in any part of the world in which he may live. While Paine was in prison in France for having tried to save the lives of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, waiting for the guillotine to deprive him of his head, he wrote the great work called "The Age of Reason," in which he appealed for the spiritual emancipation of mankind from worshiping at the altar of idolatry and superstition.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, these four titles—Common Sense, the Crisis, the Rights of Man, and the Age of Reason—have a definite application to the conditions of our own time and particularly as they affect Congress. In the days of Thomas Paine we passed through a great political revolution. To-day we are passing through one of the greatest economic revolutions that has ever afflicted our Nation.

The American workingman has liberty and freedom. He has, however, no economic security. He cries aloud for work, but the only response is the echo of his wailing cry. To balance his unemployment we give him the cutting and slashing of Federal wages. The Budget must be balanced. We must take it from the weak to strengthen the strong. We must yield to power instead of to principle.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not discussing his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, that just goes to prove that Tom Paine was right when he wrote about common sense. [Laughter.]

In the Congress of the United States, common sense has fled from some of the minds of its Representatives, and like the distinguished gentleman from Missouri in its place we find hysteria sitting upon the throne. Hysteria is the major general that is leading and driving the forces that are crushing the social and economic rights of our Federal employees.

It is therefore necessary to appeal to reason to come back to its seat, to take possession of the judgment of some of our Members of Congress, and once again endeavor to bring about the greatest good to the greatest number of our Federal employees.

From a social, from an economic, and from a political standpoint the reduction of salaries of Federal employees would be instrumental in aggravating the frozen confidence of our American people by continuing longer the economic depression in which we are now floundering.

It would reduce the standard of living in every American home, which has taken us decades and decades to perfect and develop until it has been known the world over as the American standard of living.

From an economic standpoint it would diminish the purchasing power of more than a million Federal employees. It would lengthen the depression and compel the American workingman to economize now more than ever, because of the reduction of his salary. It would be instrumental in changing the living and saving wages that he formerly received into starvation wages.

From a political standpoint, we granted Europe a moratorium. We voted $2,000,000,000 for the Finance Reconstruction Corporation. We thought this tremendous monetary contribution, designed to help railroads, large banking institutions, life-insurance companies, Federal farm banks, and other similar organizations, would be instrumental in trickling down from above to help those who are below and are in destitute circumstances, impoverished, and unemployed, who would be the beneficiaries of this special legislation. This privileged legislation was a financial blood transfusion for Europe and for those great institutions. However, it looks to me as if this financial blood is being attempted to be taken from the anæmic, impoverished, self-respecting American Federal employee—1,000,000 of them—to help those who have been responsible for bringing our country into this great economic depression in which we find ourselves at the present time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman tell us the economy to be effected by his amendment and how much money will be saved to the Public Treasury by it? We are interested in that, if the gentleman please.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, my amendment will save the Government of the United States $20,000,000. It provides that "any civil-service employee who has to his credit 30 years or more allowable service as computed under the provisions of the civil service retirement act is hereby given the right of optional retirement without regard to age and the act of May 2, 1920, as amended by the act of May 27, 1930, is accordingly amended, provided such applicant furnished proof of disability of 20 per cent or more as determined under the requirements of the Veterans' Administration."

Mr. Chairman, the liberalization of all Federal retirement laws through the enactment of a bill granting optional retirement after 30 years of service would save the Government $20,000,000 annually.

On the basis of 550,000 employees subject to the provisions of this act, the total number retired immediately would be about 15,000.

If no vacancies were filled or promotions made within the grades, as is now being considered, the annual saving to the Government would be at least $30,000,000.

If one-half of the vacancies were filled and appointments made at the entrance salary of $1,440, this saving would be about $20,000,000, and new jobs would have been provided for 7,500 of the unemployed.

Many of these faithful and loyal workers of the Federal Government who have worked more than 30 years have passed the peak of their efficiency. They impede the progress of the younger workers of lower salary grades who are not given an opportunity to perform important work. Many of these younger workers are competent and well qualified to perform work of a higher grade, but are held back, due to the stagnation incident to the present retirement law. This amendment provides for a substantial reduction without hardships to any and with benefits to many. The amendment that I have offered has met the approval of Mr. McDUFFIE, chairman of the Economy Committee, and the approval of Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. WILLIAMSON, Republican members of the Economy Committee. In my opinion, it will save at least $20,000,000, without bleeding any workingman.

It will give an opportunity to almost 10,000 to 15,000 men and women who have worked for a period of 30 years, indefatigably, loyally, and perseveringly, and who have given the best years of their lives, but who are disabled to the extent of 20 per cent of their physical and mental ability, to retire on the approval of the Veterans' Administration. When you take into consideration the fact that the average earnings of 10,000 men amounts to $2,600 a year, it will be seen that $2,600 multiplied by 10,000 amounts to $26,000,000, while 10,000 retired at a pension of $1,200 a year amounts to $12,000,000, a saving alone of $14,000,000 or $15,000,000. This would please the Federal employee and deprive no one of their labor. It would do justice to the Federal employee who has labored in the quarry of patriotic service to our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] if he is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that under the rules he must recognize some one who is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under this amendment there would be about 10,000 or 15,000 Government employees who would retire at 51 years of age, and you would find them getting 20 or 25 or even 30 per cent disability certificates from doctors for social inaptitude and various other imaginary afflictions, and they would be drawing money from the Government as retired pay for life, and soon would be holding other jobs, keeping other men out of positions.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Can the gentleman name a single individual now in the employ of the Government who wants to retire?

Mr. BLANTON. I know of many of them who have been retired on big pay who now have new jobs and are getting double salaries. When they get a chance, after they have been educated by the Government, after they have received intensive training in various bureaus, like the Bureau of Mines or the Bureau of Standards and others, there are those who want to retire when some commercial institution comes along and offers them two or three times the pay they are getting from the Government. Then they will want to be retired, and it is very easy for them to get some doctor to give them a 30 per cent disability certificate. Then they draw retired pay and also a big salary. I am not in favor of it. That is a scandal in this Government to-day—having men retired on big pay for life right here in the city of Washington and then getting another big salary in a new position and drawing two or three pays. It is infamous; it is outrageous.

What are you going to do about it? Just keep on retiring them? There are bunches of them here. I have put hundreds of their names in the RECORD. Just ask the people over the country if they want that to continue. Who is it that is clamoring for this early retirement at 51 for a 30 per cent presumptive disability? Is it any reason to retire a man simply because he has worked 30 years and reached the age of 51 years?

There are married couples who have lived together 60 years, and the husband is still the breadwinner of the family. Is 51 years old? Look at the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MCFADDEN. He is 51 years of age, and last Tuesday he whipped the whole Republican Party to a finish in Pennsylvania. [Applause.] I do not know where it is all leading. I am sure when Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. MCDUFFIE intimated that they were not objecting to this amendment, they did not realize what it really means to the people of the country. There is a provision in this bill to stop these retired fellows from drawing two salaries where either one of the salaries is over $3,000. That is put in there to correct this abuse. I hope my friend MCDUFFIE will not agree to this amendment. We ought to vote it down; it is vicious; it is carrying out and continuing this very abuse; it is permitting an abuse to continue that we ought not to permit to continue.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. To be frank with the gentleman, I never saw the amendment until about an hour ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I was sure that the gentleman has not digested it.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. I had the word of Mr. Brown, of the Bureau of Efficiency, to the effect that it would save $10,000,000, and I said that I am in favor of any amendment that will save that much money.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the very first provision in this economy measure ought to have been a provision to repeal the Efficiency Bureau and Mr. Brown with it. Every one of us who knows anything about Mr. Brown and his Efficiency Bureau knows that he has caused more inefficiency in this Government than all other bureaus combined. I do not believe a word he says about it. He is so inefficient himself, and he has such an army of superlative inefficients working under him, that he has no more idea about a real economy program than a bunch of wild hogs in a cornfield.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman know, or does anybody know, how many would be eligible for retirement under this, and how much money it would amount to, and how many more would be put in their places?

Mr. BLANTON. I know that if you ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he will tell you that when they first proposed this emergency officers' retirement act, the Veterans' Bureau sent up to his committee, and he has the report now, the statement that it would affect only 890 officers, and 7,000, approximately of them have been retired at this time. We must vote down this amendment and all similar ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate is exhausted upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: In the second last line of the amendment strike out "20 per cent" and insert "25 per cent."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore not looked with favor upon propositions of optional retirement after 30 years of service, regardless of age, but this proposition is only applicable to those who have served 30 years and who may lack a few years of the retirement age, which, with the general run of employees, is 70 years. It only applies to those who have such an appreciable degree of disability, as ascertained by the Government, and not certified by a private physician, as effectively to impair their usefulness to the Government as an employee.

The way to illustrate is to point out concrete examples. I have personal knowledge of two men in an administrative office who are receiving salaries of $5,000 each. They are about 50 per cent efficient, but they lack a few years of the retirement age. Nobody in authority will discharge them.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Briefly; yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would like the gentleman to explain whether, if these men are to be retired, their positions are to be filled immediately?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will come to that. That is one of the reasons why I favor this provision. Those men, upon reaching the retirement age in two or three or four years, would be able to retire at an annuity of $1,200, of which the Government pays substantially $900 and the other $300 is paid for by their contributions since the retirement system has been in existence. There are two inefficient employees to whom the Government is paying $10,000 a year, and they can be gotten rid of for $1,800 and their places do not have to be filled.

It has been repeated here time after time that there are from 60,000 to 80,000 employees to be discharged by reason of the 10 per cent reduction in the appropriation bills by the Senate.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. LARSEN. Does that 25 per cent mean permanent disability or temporary disability?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is permanent. It is covered by the other provisions concerning the disability retirement in the act.

Mr. LARSEN. There ought not be any doubt about that. It ought to be an established fact.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Very well.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman tell us if there is any saving to be effected by it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is a minimum saving of $10,000,000 by this amendment, and there is a possibility of that saving amounting to $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. Ten million dollars is the minimum.

Mr. SIROVICH. If 7,500 are retired, the saving would be $11,000,000. If 15,000 are retired the saving would be from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; and not one of those who have been retired need be replaced, if what the committee tell us the personnel law will bring about. If we can get rid of a certain number of employees, is it not better to get rid of those who have a small pittance to live on rather than to turn them loose on the street without a cent, particularly if it is not necessary to fill their positions?

I heartily approve of this, and I withdraw the amendment which I had offered, Mr. Chairman, and will offer the following amendment, that before the word "disability" where it occurs in the amendment, there be inserted the word "permanent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Before the word "disability," in the second last line of the amendment, insert the word "permanent."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment. I move that the figure "30" be inserted instead of the figure "20."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: In next to the last line of the amendment offered by Mr. SIROVICH strike out the figures "20" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "30."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIROVICH) there were—ayes 78, noes 153.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: On page 12 strike out lines 1 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I realize the temper of the committee, and I am not going to detain you but a minute, because the amendment is very easy to explain.

For over 50 years labor has fought for the right to receive overtime when required to work extra hours, and it has fought for the right to receive extra pay when required to work on Sundays and holidays. Section 207 of this bill takes that right away from the Government employees, and I seek to remove that section from the bill. It is one of the six sections each of which reduces employees' salaries.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sure my friend from Missouri also realizes that in this section there is a cut of 10 per cent on employees getting less than $2,500 a year.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I realize that and have called it to the attention of the committee on several occasions. A further cut of 10 per cent is correct, as I stated a moment ago.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will impress that fact on the committee, because we have put into this measure an exemption of $2,500 as to those working during the day while those working at night, under arduous conditions and not from their own choice, have a 10 per cent cut made in their pay, which is entirely unjustifiable.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is another discrimination to which I have called the attention of the committee time and again during the last two days. My friend asks me to impress that fact on the committee. I reply I have done so to the best of my ability. The committee, I am sure, understands the situation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. This is most unjust, and should be taken out of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is this section temporary or permanent?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This section is permanent.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. By this section the Economy Committee repeals overtime pay and pay for Sundays and holidays.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is correct. I now desire to correct the statement I just made to the gentleman from Virginia. This is temporary for one year, not permanent.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. At this time of world distress there is but one thing of which gentlemen need be afraid and that is failure to serve the general welfare. If I may say it without any offense to any individual or to any group, the legislation which we have been enacting in the last two days does not meet and discharge the highest duty that rests upon the Congress. Gentlemen seem not to have heard the rumblings of the gathering storm of public discontent, discontent that arises because of the failure of the Congress to evidence an appreciation of the responsibility that is upon it, and that is to enact economy measures within the understanding of the people. There is such a thing, my fellows, as virtuous anger. Some one has said it is one of the sinews of the soul.

The anger and the wrath that will come down upon us if Congress continues in the course it has been pursuing for the last two days will be that which is justifiable, which is virtuous, and in which there is no sin. Why do not gentlemen recall the exclamation of Uncle Toby, in Mr. Sterne's Tristram Shandy, when, standing by the bedside of the despairing and failing child, he cried out, "By God, he shall not die," and the accusing angel winged his way off to heaven and gave in the oath with a blush, but the recording angel as he wrote it down dropped a tear upon the word and blotted it out forever.

Are not Members of Congress and are not the employees of this Government ready and willing to evidence something of a spirit of sacrifice? It is that part of you, my fellows, that is akin to God, and in its indulgence at this time of national stress we can find, and Federal employees ought to find, a solemn sort of joy.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, and to you, my fellows, that the hour has struck when we must forget self and when we must take into account the condition of the people throughout this whole country and forget that we are serving a mere group. Remember, to-morrow we shall be called upon to answer, and if we fail to give an answer, as I have stated, that is within the comprehension and understanding of the people, we will be swept out of our seats in Congress, and we ought to be swept out. [Applause.]

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, we are losing public confidence, we are losing the esteem of the people, and the time is at hand when every man must rise in the dignity of his own manhood and accept his responsibility as a Representative of all the people and render that character of service which evidences an understanding of the meaning and the purpose of our membership of this great body. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, to strike out, on page 12, lines 2, 3, 4, and 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 12, strike out lines 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will at least address himself to the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; the suggestion is very good. I will not follow the previous speaker.

Mr. MEAD. I think we should have the right to honestly divide on this question without being lectured every few hours. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is not referring to me?

Mr. MEAD. No; I am sure the gentleman is not going to lecture us.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I have the attention of the chairman of the committee? If we struck out lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, we would not disturb the overtime law. By leaving in the remainder of the paragraph, which reads, "In so far as practicable, overtime work and night work shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a day's work," and so on, we would carry out the intention of the gentleman and at the same time would not destroy the overtime and night work pay law; may I say it would be an incentive to employ these extra people, because you would have to pay overtime if you used a regular employee.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. There is one class of Federal employee with respect to whom the language following line 5 could not very well be applied, the railway mail clerks. He is on the train and his overtime can not be regulated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We should not legislate their rights away. People who must work nights are entitled to the night differential.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. As a matter of fact, there are only about 14,000 such employees.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I submit that this would really be a saving without disturbing the law. We are very keen about this and with all due deference to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] we are not representing a group. We are representing here the American workers and are fighting for human happiness. Labor conditions are fundamental. You can invoke the Almighty and so can we invoke the Almighty to give the American workingman a chance to live under decent conditions, and if he has to work at night, he is entitled to overtime.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield for a matter of information? Does a substitute for night work receive the regular compensation or does he receive a lower rate of compensation by reason of being a substitute?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. By reason of being a substitute, according to your provision, he would have to do the overtime work and receive the substitute's pay.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That is exactly my understanding.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. There would be an incentive to do this. It would employ more people and would save the principle of the law that we are fighting for. It took labor 50 years to get that law and that recognition.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The saving would be approximately the same after that language had been stricken out, is that correct?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is my intention, and it would save the principle that we are fighting for.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The language left after the gentleman's amendment is adopted, if it be adopted, and I can not agree with the gentleman at all, does not make it mandatory that substitutes be used.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the gentleman's language, not mine.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I know it is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It says, "in so far as practicable, overtime work and night work shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a day's work."

Mr. McDUFFIE. If men work during the day, under this language they will not work in the night but will stop when the day is over.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Right.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then we will have the substitute come in and therefore we say that when you have done a day's work, stop, and let somebody else do the overtime work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Alabama does not want men to work night and day?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not want them to work both night and day. That is exactly the point. I want the substitute to come in and take the place of the man who has worked during the day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is what I want. We are in complete accord.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I agree with the gentleman that his amendment is sound, and, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman strikes out the first five lines, then we are not going to have any substitutes employed, because the regular employees will prefer to work, and they are going to get paid for overtime.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; because the balance of the paragraph says that the substitute must work.

Mr. BLANTON. No; that is not mandatory, that is only discretionary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They can not work men night and day without extra pay.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the men themselves want it sometimes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the substitute works at night he does not receive overtime pay, and the Postmaster General will effect a saving by requiring them to work the substitute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And we save the principle and the overtime and night work law we are fighting for.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I have voted for practically every economy amendment that has been offered. But I must confess that we are getting nowhere.

I listened a moment ago to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], and I wish to call his attention to the fact that you can not cure a panic with economy. We can pass this bill with every economy amendment that has been offered and the country will be in as bad condition as it is now.

Why spend this time milling around, attempting to cure the worst panic the country has ever seen by measures of this kind? You are never going to cure this panic until you restore the buying power of the American people.

A MEMBER. How can that be done?

Mr. RANKIN. By expanding the currency and putting sufficient money in circulation to restore commodity prices.

The lifeblood of the Nation has dried up. There is an insufficient amount of the circulating medium of the country. Commodity prices have fallen; wheat is lower to-day than it has been for 30 years; cotton does not pay the cost of production; corn does not pay the cost of production; your bread lines are lengthening; and conditions generally are growing worse day by day, while we are milling around here attempting to cure this depression by cutting down salaries and reducing wages.

If you would put in the same effort, the same energy, working out measures to bring back the buying power of the American people, to restore prosperity to the producers of the country, you would not have to come here and do night work, milling around here like the mannikins in Lilliput, trying to determine which end of the egg should be broken first. [Laughter.]

I am willing to cut expenses; I voted to cut my own salary; but we had just as well adjourn now if we are going to try to cure this panic by this kind of legislation.

Let me tell you another thing. I am going to oppose any adjournment of this Congress until something is done to relieve these conditions. You are not going to adjourn in June if I can prevent it if conditions remain as they are now or continue to grow worse. The American people will not stand for your going back home and asking them to reelect you when you have done nothing to relieve their suffering.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thought the gentleman was opposed to this amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Alabama or those with whom he trains would spend more effort trying to get at the root of this trouble; if they would make more of a struggle to relieve this panic in the right way and less time on legislation of this kind, he would understand better my position and my disappointment when I see Congress thus milling around, accomplishing nothing, and conditions growing worse daily throughout the country. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be understood that this is a part of the program of the nonpartisan committee. It means five or six hundred thousand dollars if these lines are stricken out, and it means the employment of the unemployed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 54, noes 132.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 12, after the abbreviation and the figures, strike out the remainder of line 2, and all of lines 3, 4, and 5, and down to and including the word "practicable," in line 6.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee should accept this amendment because it obviates the objection made to the amendment that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] offered, that is, to make this mandatory that the overtime work shall be done by substitutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that includes mail clerks, which will be utterly impossible.

Mr. JONES. That was explained. There are comparatively few of them.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Fourteen thousand of them.

Mr. JONES. But that is only a small number as compared with the rest that are included.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman explain how overtime work would be performed in the case of the railway mail clerk?

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, the mail clerk, of course, would have to go ahead and do his work during the period, or they would have to employ additional clerks to do the work. But that is only a small phase of it. If you adopt this amendment you would have the work done by regular employees, and then you would give extra work to extra people without extra pay. That is what you seem to be wanting to do.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. But under the language of the gentleman's amendment, in the case of railway mail clerks substitutes, they would have to be carried on the train.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent to correct that language by adding the words "except in the case of railway mail clerks" at the beginning of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. JONES. Then I offer it as an amendment with that additional language placed before it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And I make the point of order that it is in the third degree.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by striking out the first five lines and line 6 down to and including the word "practicable" and insert in lieu thereof the words "except as to railway mail clerks."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 12, beginning in line 2, after the abbreviation and the figures, strike out the remainder of line 1, and all of line 2 and all of lines 3, 4, and 5, down to and including the word "practicable" in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "except as to railway mail clerks."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the effect of striking out the first five lines is to make the balance of the section permanent legislation. Such was not the intention of the committee. This section was drafted with a view to tiding over the emergency. It ought not to be made permanent legislation. That is one objection to it. In the second place, striking out the first five lines would mean that we would lose the saving for the next fiscal year of $5,600,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then frankly it is the intention of the committee, regardless of the merits, to abolish overtime and night differentials.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. For the year 1933, and the reason for it is we know that there is not going to be a sufficient appropriation to carry on this work, and by being able to get rid of overtime we can make a substantial saving and use substitutes in place of regular men and keep more men at work. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKSTEIN: Amend section 207 by substituting a colon for the period at the end of the section and adding: "Provided, That this section shall not apply to compensation for overtime services performed by Federal employees under existing laws at the expense of private interests."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What happened to the Cochran amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That has not been voted upon. These are perfecting amendments to section 207.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the Cochran amendment was to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the entire section.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that the language carried in the bill does not affect any pay other than that which comes from the Treasury of the United States, and it is entirely covered. The point which the gentleman raises is entirely covered. Certainly we are not trying to stop a steamship company from paying some agent who is employed by the Government, if he cares to work for that steamship company.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee on the point raised.

During the summer months there are steamships coming in at all hours of the night, which have to be cleared. Under a law that was passed in the Seventy-first Congress in 1931, private steamship companies were authorized to clear their ships after a certain hour at night, if they would pay the men time and one-half. That money goes into the Public Treasury. Then the Public Treasury, through the Department of Labor, pays the men who work all night to clear those ships. That money goes into the Treasury, and if this bill is passed, that money will remain there, and those who are entitled to receive the money will not be paid. Even the extra help that would be employed to clear those ships would not be paid. They would not be able to take $1 out of the Treasury, because under the provision of the bill, in section 207, there is no payment permitted for overtime.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Will this not apply only to a few customs officers and immigration officers?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is all. Not $1 is coming out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it goes into the Treasury.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It goes into the Treasury, but we will not be able to take it out, and it does not affect this bill at all.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. If the law already does what the gentleman says it does, this would only have the effect of clarifying it?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amount saved is worth the time we are taking. I do not agree with the gentleman, but I will accept the amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the Dickstein amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to section 207, page 12: At the end of the paragraph, line 12, add: "Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply when such higher rate of compensation for night work or for work on Sundays and holidays is paid by the master, owner, or agent of a vessel, railroad, or vehicle, or other interests accommodated."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Has the Dickstein amendment been disposed of?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No. This is a substitute for the Dickstein amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a substitute amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offered the substitute is because it is more specific to the cases that the gentleman from New York has in mind. It refers directly to the overtime paid under acts of Congress, by steamship companies and railroads and owners of other vehicles. This money, by statute, is collected from these transportation companies as payment for working overtime, in order that they may not be delayed in the discharge of their passengers and the transportation of their cargoes and freight. That is paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The overtime is paid, under the general provisions for the payment of overtime, night work and Sunday work. Unless this exception is made, the Government will be in the position of collecting this overtime and withholding it from the employees.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. The difference between the gentleman's amendment and the amendment offered by Mr. Dickstein is what?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is that the gentleman's amendment is general language, and mine is specific in cases.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman's amendment follows the statute, does it not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Did my amendment not follow the statute, by providing exactly what the bill provided, which was passed by Congress, authorizing steamship companies or private interests who wanted to discharge passengers and freight after a certain period to pay this money into the Treasury? It does not come out of the United States Treasury at all. That money goes into a public fund, and under this law, if it is passed as it is, we will never be able to pay them back for their overtime.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute amendment is withdrawn.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKSTEIN) there were ayes 94 and noes 10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the Dickstein amendment has been adopted by the House. If the Cochran amendment is adopted, what happens to the Dickstein amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It strikes out the entire section 207.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that this House is in favor of private industry paying overtime without——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 11, line 25, after the word "exceed," strike out "$2" and insert in lieu thereof "$4."

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment in effect increases the per diem allowance now authorized by law from $3 to $4. It also increases the charge upon the Treasury of the United States and we are now considering a bill to effect economy. The amendment is, therefore, not germane to either the title or the section.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order the present rate is only $3, and this amendment makes it $4.

Mr. McKEOWN. If the gentleman will reserve his point of order, I will explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair understands that the present rate is $3, and that the amendment seeks to make it $4. So the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not germane, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

All a fellow traveling in the Postal Service can get is $3 a day. I thought he should get $4. When a fellow in the State Department rides around he gets $7 a day. When a fellow over in the Agriculture Department travels around he gets $5 a day, and so it goes. It just depends on your station in life or in what department you are working as to how much you get to ride around over the country.

For my part I have never understood why the Congress of the United States should permit employees in one department to receive $6 and $8 a day and only give employees in other departments enough money to let them ride in the baggage coach, or in the car up front. Some fellows ride in Pullman cars and other fellows have to ride in the day coach; and you are cutting the allowance down to $2. Why do you not cut the allowance of the man getting $5 and $6 a day as travel allowance down to $2? Let us not discriminate in favor of one class against another.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I know one of the attorneys of the Veterans' Bureau who saves the United States Government thousands and thousands of dollars every year on veterans' claims who has never been able to meet his expenses on the present allowance.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am not talking about him, but I say if you are going to give one man $2 why do you not give them all $2?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As a matter of fact, the gentleman is speaking now of subsection (a) instead of subsection (d). This applies to railway mail men altogether.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. One of their representatives came to my office and said that this was to give them subsistence. They are paid a little more than the average man. They said they could get along on $2 now where it took $3 several years ago. They said they were satisfied with $2.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am not going to criticize the gentleman's committee; and I want to say to the gentleman and his committee that you have been working hard and you have worked now until you have been going around in circles. You are tired. You have worked yourselves nearly to death. I came in here yesterday morning just as mad as a wet hen because you brought in this rule. I think the gentleman from Alabama has done more work than anybody else and that he ought to take a little rest and just go along a little easy. We have got to the point that when we see a man rise on the floor we get mad; and we have been fighting and fighting and getting so mad we can not see straight.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. May I ask whether this section covers postal inspectors, too?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; this relates to the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. McKEOWN. We are trying to do here in a few hours what we should have undertaken to do months ago, and the result is that the President's program staggered us so that we have not been able to stagger back and see what is going on; we have got so staggered around here that we just can not get down to business. Let us get going and do the best we can with as good feeling as possible. We will all feel better when the job is done right.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on all amendments to this title do now close.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have been asking recognition for an hour.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then, in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: Page 8, line 10, after the word "session," strike out lines 11, 12, and 13, and on page 9, line 1, after the word "positions," strike out the remainder of the line, line 2, and line 3 to the period.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, these sections have to do with the exclusion of the Coast Guard from the sacrifices which are being asked of other governmental employees, including the Army and the Navy. The implication that will go to the country is that this House is subserviently and submissively yielding to the dictation of an organized group interested in propaganda for the enforcement of a pet law for which the Coast Guard is used. I refer to the prohibition law. I know of no reason why this section should be left in the bill and this organization excluded. There would only be a few dollars involved if these sections should be taken out of this bill. In order that this House may be protected from that implication, I ask that that be done. If this is an effort to protect the Coast Guard from temptations, the money involved is not sufficient to match that of the rum smugglers.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Would the gentleman mind explaining the purport of his amendment?

Mr. WHITE. It takes out those three lines on page 8 referring to the exclusion of the Coast Guard from the reductions that are made for other services.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Does the gentleman understand that there are commissioned officers in the Coast Guard just as there are in the Army?

Mr. WHITE. I do.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. If the gentleman will turn to line 21, on page 7, he will find the following language:

No administrative promotions in the civil branch of the United States Government—

That language is limited to the civil branch. Therefore, if what is done with respect to the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army and the Navy is correct the same privilege should be extended to the enlisted and commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard.

Mr. WHITE. This is an entirely different section from the one the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that there are 12,082 Government pay rollers in the Coast Guard to-day, over twice as many as there were in 1923, when the total was 4,737, before we put prohibition enforcement into the hands of the Coast Guard?

Mr. WHITE. Yes. I have those figures.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the Federal employees should have this section apply to them, there is no reason under the sun why the Coast Guard should not have it apply to their personnel as well.

Mr. WHITE. None at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And if the gentleman from Wisconsin did not eternally encourage and protect the people that the Coast Guard cutters are after we would not need one-third as many of them.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is for economy on every question except when it applies to the fanatical prohibition law.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. It is evident to me, though perhaps not to the Members here generally, that we are not making any progress worth while in the consideration of this piece of legislation. In my judgment, it ought never to have been presented to the House; but the fact that it is here certainly impels us to give it at least respectable consideration to the end that we may dispose of it with as much intelligence as we are capable of. This legislation is dragging along——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa this afternoon took considerable time in presenting his proposition, which I think should have been passed by this committee. He is a very distinguished and able Member of this House and a great parliamentarian; but I want to make a suggestion, if I may, to the gentleman from Alabama, who has been working most earnestly in connection with this legislation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thank the gentleman; but let us get on.

Mr. DYER. I want to make a suggestion to him, and it is this: It is evident to me, and I am sure it is to every Member of this committee, that in these night sessions we are making no progress in the consideration of this legislation. [Applause.]

I suggest to the gentleman that he try his best to arrange for us to meet an hour or so earlier in the consideration of this legislation and not have night sessions. I hope the membership will stand by the gentleman. I think the gentleman ought to try to do this, because night sessions are accomplishing nothing.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this title and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CROSSER: On page 9, line 16, strike out section 204.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, this section is a deliberate and a cold-blooded attempt to throw out in the cold men who have, perhaps, spent 35 or 40 or 45 years of their lives in the Postal Service. These men who may have reached 65 years of age would be compelled, no matter how well fitted they are to go on with their work, to go out in the highways and byways on a pension. I submit that this is not fair. It is no wise and it is not in the best interests of the people of the United States that this should be done.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the gentleman will permit, this provision refers to any service, and not the Postal Service alone.

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; you are right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without any effort at rhetorical flourish, I want to say to the distinguished gentleman who spoke a few moments ago and told us that under no circumstances must we concern ourselves about any selfish group that I, too, urge men not to yield to the demands of the selfish. Of course, that is true; and it is just because I think that, so far as this title is concerned, does serve the interests of a selfish group that I am unalterably opposed to it. The special-privilege seekers always urge the reduction of wages.

Just to the extent that you reduce and keep pushing down the compensation of men who render honest service, just to that extent are you serving the powers of privilege and of pelf. I say, therefore, we are doing more to serve the general good, which should be the object of all of us, by opposing this vicious legislation than if we were to go out advocating it.

Let me read to you just along this line what one of the most famous economists in the world has to say in the Atlantic Monthly for May, 1932. Mr. John Maynard Keynes, who has been the consultant in economics in practically all the important world conferences, writes as follows in an article on the World's Economic Outlook:

> It is not the harshness and the niggardliness of nature which are oppressing us, but our own incompetence and wrong-headedness which hinder us from making use of the bountifulness of inventive science and cause us to be overwhelmed by its generous fruits. The voices which—in such a conjuncture—tell us that the path of escape is to be found in strict economy and in refraining, wherever possible, from utilizing the world's potential production are the voices of fools and madmen.

This is from one of the most distinguished economists in the world.

Just a word more. If you would stop to think of it for just one moment, you could see that the more we reduce the purchasing power of the average individual of the United States, and thereby reduce the commerce of the United States, the less possible it is to collect any taxes at all to operate our Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to find myself in opposition to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], but it was the Government employee who came to the Congress and asked us to pass this law, and after we passed the law the Government employee came back and asked us to increase the annuity and it was increased to $1,200. There is not one out of ten employees who will be affected by this provision who will not receive $1,200 a year.

This provision would not turn these people out on the streets. They would be retired with pay, as they have asked to be retired, when they reach this age or have served the number of years required under the law.

Under another section of the bill the positions can not be filled and this means a job for somebody now in the service, whereas, if you strike out this provision you are going to place people out on the street without any retirement pay.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. Ought there not to be a proviso in this section that in the case of technical or professional men whose services can not be dispensed with without serious injury to the public service, like scientists in the Bureau of Standards, upon a certificate of the President may be excepted from the provisions of this act?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I know of no such person in the service of the Government. If such an employee happens to die, the Government goes along just the same.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, the hour is getting late, and I want to give the committee the benefit of such information as I have. Our purpose is to finish Title II and read Title III, but offer no amendment to Title III. After Title II is completed we will close debate in a few moments, and there will be no need for Members to remain, if they do not wish to hear the reading of Title III.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER: Page 13, line 24, after the words "District of Columbia," insert: "Provided further, That Members of Congress shall not expend any part of the money appropriated to them for the employment of any person or persons related to them by affinity or consanguinity according to the civil law unless such person or persons are actually employed in connection with the official business of such office."

Mr. McDUFFIE. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in section 209 this Congress is declaring a most important policy. It is declaring that it is the policy of this Government to discharge persons, if it becomes necessary, who are married and live with their husbands or wives.

In this machine age, even when conditions get better, we are going to have a great surplus of unemployed. We do not want a dole. I say to you that it is fundamental in this country that a man who is honest and willing to work must be given a job, or else somebody is going to have to help keep him.

I say that if a relative is actually engaged in business connected with the office this amendment does not apply.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman call the attention of the House to the fact that we have got a similar provision for the clerks in the departments?

Mr. MOUSER. That is a fact.

Mr. CLANCY. What does the amendment mean when it says that he can not hire an affinity? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOUSER. I think, even though the gentleman is a bachelor, he knows what it means. Now, I claim it is wrong to appoint a relative to a position which was increased a thousand dollars during the last session of Congress on the pay roll for the purpose of increasing your own salary. I read in the paper to-day where a distinguished Member of this Congress had on the pay roll his aged mother-in-law, who was not doing anything in connection with the office.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think that is a good place to keep a mother-in-law? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOUSER. My good friend JOHN CLARKE, of New York, wants his mother-in-law to have a feather bed. [Laughter.] There are Members of Congress, and I am not referring to any particular individual or indulging in any personalities, who have clerks established back home looking after the fences, who have nothing to do with the official business of the office.

We are now asking Federal employees to make sacrifices. Is it right that Members of Congress should divert that money for their own selfish purpose? I know a Member of Congress who had a girl in his office, a very efficient secretary, whom he finally chose to make his wife. I think he has a perfect right to employ her. She is accustomed to the ways of his office and the manner of his doing business. I trust the gentleman from Alabama will not make his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOUSER) there were—ayes 40, noes 88.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONDON: On page 13, line 24, after the word "Columbia" in section 209, strike out the period, insert a colon, and the words following: "Provided, That any honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine, who as such is entitled to preference in the civil service under existing civil service laws and regulations, shall not be dismissed, if employed in the class to be reduced, before other persons not so entitled are dismissed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONDON) there were—ayes 26, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILSON: Page 9, line 23, after "contrary," insert "unless the President, whenever in his judgment the continuance of such person in such service would be advantageous to the public service, by Executive order, continues such person in such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Page 14, beginning in line 1, strike out all of section 210.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 11, line 12, strike out the figures "25" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "50."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 11, line 18, after the semicolon insert: "And all mail sent by Members of Congress or the Senate shall bear stamps purchased by such Members at the regular postal rates."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 11, beginning in line 10, strike out all of subsection (c) down to and including the word "per cent."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 24, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 308. The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to discontinue the Army Transport Service. He shall transfer the seagoing vessels used in such service to the United States Shipping Board. The Secretary of War shall dispose of as much of the property of the United States (other than vessels) used in connection with such service as is not indispensable for other uses of the Army or the War Department, and shall take such action as may be necessary to discharge the obligations of the United States growing out of such service existing at the time of such discontinuance. Thereafter no part of appropriations heretofore or hereafter made shall be available for the continuance of such service, and appropriations and unexpended balances of appropriations the expenditure of which is made unnecessary by this section shall not be expended but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

SEC. 309. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to transfer the vessels Henderson, Chaumont, Kittery, Sirius, and Vega, together with any cargo vessels not in commission which are not indispensable in the naval service, to the United States Shipping Board. The Secretary shall discontinue the operation of that part of the naval transportation service now carried on with the use of such vessels and shall dispose of as much of the property used in connection therewith as is not indispensable for other uses of the Navy. SEC. 310. No action shall be taken under the provisions of section 308 or 309 until the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, has negotiated contracts with private shipping interests for the performance of the services for which the vessels referred to were operated, under the terms of which, in the judgment of the President, such services will be performed efficiently, at reasonable charges, with accommodations substantially of equal class with those afforded by the services discontinued, and at less cost. Any such contract shall provide that the rates for Government passenger (including employees and their families) and freight business shall be at least 25 per cent less than the published conference rates for similar commercial passenger and freight business. Any such contract shall be renewable on the same terms, at the option of the Government, and the contract shall so provide.

The Panama Railroad Co. is hereby authorized and directed to discontinue the operation of the Panama Railroad Steamship Line and such company shall take such action as may be necessary to dispose of the vessels used by such line and to wind up its affairs. The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary on his part to carry out the purposes of this section. No action shall be taken under the provisions of this section until contracts have been negotiated with private shipping interests for the performance of the services for the Government theretofore performed by the Panama Railroad Steamship Line, under the terms of which, in the judgment of the President, such services will be performed efficiently, at reasonable charges, with accommodations substantially of equal class with those afforded by the Panama Railroad Steamship Line, and at less cost. Any such contract shall provide that the rates for Government and the Panama Railroad Co. passenger (including employees and their families) and freight business shall be at least 25 per cent less than the published conference rates for similar commercial passenger and freight business. Not more than two of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

(b) Terms of office of the first commissioners appointed under this section shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, one at the end of one year, one at the end of two years, one at the end of three years, and one at the end of four years after the date of the enactment of this act. The term of office of a successor to any such commissioner shall expire four years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that a commissioner appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) the United States Shipping Board as constituted upon the date of the enactment of this act shall continue to function until the date of reorganization of the commission pursuant to the provisions of such subsection. The board shall be deemed to be reorganized upon such date as four of the commissioners appointed as provided in such subsection have taken office, and no such commissioner shall be paid salary, as such commissioner, for any period prior to such date.

(d) This section shall be held to reorganize the United States Shipping Board, and, except as herein modified, all laws relating to such board shall remain in full force and effect, as herein amended, and no regulations, action, investigations, or other proceedings under any such laws existing or pending on the date of the enactment of this act shall abate or otherwise be affected by reason of the provisions of this section.

(e) Whenever under existing law the concurrence of four or more of the commissioners is required, such requirement of law shall, after the reorganization of the board provided by this section, be held to be complied with by the concurrence of three commissioners.

(f) After June 30, 1932, no officer or employee of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation shall receive a salary at a rate in excess of $10,000 per annum. The provisions of Title I of this act shall not apply to any person whose compensation is reduced by reason of this subsection.

(g) $200,000 of the unexpended balance of the allotment of $500,000 made available to the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation for experimental and research work, by the independent offices appropriation act, fiscal year 1930, and continued by subsequent appropriation acts, shall not be expended, but shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(h) The sums available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, for personal services of employees of the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation assigned to and serving with the United States Shipping Board are reduced by $167,000, and the amounts of reduction applicable to the various bureaus shall be as follows: (1) Bureau of Research, $30,000; (2) Bureau of Law, $103,000; (3) Bureau of Traffic, $9,000; (4) Bureau of Construction, $5,000; and (5) Bureau of Operations, $20,000.

(i) The United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation shall, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, transfer from the operating funds and cover into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts the sum of $1,938,240.

INCREASES IN CERTAIN CHARGES AND FEES

SEC. 315. After the date of the enactment of this act, the price at which additional copies of Government publications are offered for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Documents shall be based on the cost of printing and binding, plus 30 per cent, and such cost shall be in lieu of that prescribed in the public resolution approved May 11, 1922 (U. S. C., title 44, sec. 220).

SEC. 316. After the expiration of 30 days after the enactment of this act (but in no event prior to July 1, 1932), the base fee of $25 provided by section 4934 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 35, sec. 78), to be paid upon the filing of each original application and upon each renewal application for patent, except in design cases, and on issuing each original patent, except in design cases, is hereby increased to $30.

SEC. 317. Section 4934 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 35, sec. 78), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

SEC. 318. The Secretary of Commerce shall make such charges as he deems reasonable for special statistical services; special commodity, technical, and regional news bulletins and periodical services; lists of foreign buyers, and World Trade Directory Reports, and the amounts collected therefrom shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 5. For tests or investigations authorized by the Secretary of Commerce under the provisions of this act, as amended and supplemented, except those performed for the Government of the United States or State governments within the United States, a fee sufficient in each case to compensate the Bureau of Mines for the entire cost of the services rendered shall be charged, according to a schedule prepared by the Director of the Bureau of Mines and approved by the Secretary of Commerce, who shall prescribe rules and regulations under which such tests and investigations may be made. All moneys received from such sources shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts."

SEC. 320. Section 8 of the act entitled "An act to establish the National Bureau of Standards," approved March 3, 1901, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 276), is amended to read as follows:

All moneys received from such sources shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts."

SEC. 321. Sections 318, 319, and 320 shall take effect July 1, 1932.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., LL. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Eternal God, whose will doth sway the destiny of the universe and of human life, before whose eyes nothing is covered or concealed; preserve us in our secret life from all idle reverie, from all impurity of thought, from moments of self-pity, pride, and petulance, and give to us the inner calm, the fine serenity of souls principled in faith and hope and love.

Touch Thou our lips with kindly wisdom, that with grace and clearest insight our words may rise on winged feet above confusion's wide expanse, clothing our thought with the rare bloom and fragrance of that knowledge which reveals the constant inflowing of God into the affairs of men. We ask it in the name and for the sake of Him who spake as never man spake, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CLAIMS OF INDIANS IN OREGON—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 89)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I am returning herewith Senate bill 826, "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine claims of certain bands or tribes of Indians residing in the State of Oregon," without my approval.

The bill limits the claims which can be presented to those "arising under or growing out of any treaty, agreement, act of Congress, Executive order," and then throws the door wide open by adding "or otherwise." I can not assent to the proposition that the Government should be obligated after 75 years to defend a suit for unknown claims of such ancient origin and for persons long since dead not based upon any treaty, agreement, act of Congress, or Executive order.

I want full justice for our Indian wards, and would have no objection to the presentation of claims arising under the treaties named in the bill, both ratified and unratified treaties. I am advised, however, that all funds promised to these Indians under the ratified treaties have been appropriated and paid, and that lands were set aside for, and occupied by, the Indians who were parties to the unratified treaties. I am further constrained to this action at a time when the Government can not assume additional and unknown burdens of expenditure.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the veto message, with the accompanying enrolled bill, may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, some days ago I communicated with Professor Taussig, of Harvard University, who is an outstanding economist, well known to the Members of this body, as to whether he approved or disapproved of the proposal for an enlarged public-works program to help revitalize trade and solve unemployment. I have his answer to that communication which I ask may be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., April 27, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of April 20, and regret that my answer has been delayed by my absence from Cambridge. I am glad to see that you continue your work toward mending the depression by careful and discriminating expenditure on public works on the part of the Federal Government. I believe you are on the right track and hope you will succeed. Your own view as stated in the third paragraph of your letter (of which I assume you have kept a copy) seems to me well justified.

No one can be sure just how great an effect will be produced. I have no doubt that you will agree with me that this is not a panacea, but is an important step which may do considerable good, and may do good far beyond the immediate operations, for it is possible that this would help substantially toward giving the much-needed boost.

I can not pretend to be conversant with the extent of the preparations which the departments have made for carrying into effect the proposed construction. I take your word for it that adequate preparations have been made, and that there is reasonable assurance of a proper expenditure of the funds. I am quite in accord with you that the proper way of financing is the issue of long-term bonds. In short, I believe you are on sound ground.

If it would be of help to you to show to others this brief statement of my attitude you are entirely at liberty to do so.

Very truly yours,

F. W. TAUSSIG.

The Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

TAX ON LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is a wide difference of opinion over the tax to be levied in the revenue bill upon life-insurance companies. Various rate proposals have been made, and the effect that some of these proposals would have upon the various groups of life-insurance companies is striking. In view of these contentions, I ask that a letter written by the chairman of the Federal tax committee of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, which I send to the desk, may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ASSOCIATION OF LIFE INSURANCE PRESIDENTS,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The majority opinion of the Finance Committee in the action taken on Wednesday with respect to life-insurance taxes leaves the companies operating on a 3 per cent reserve basis in a most unbearable position.

It so greatly increases their taxable income as against that of the 3½ per cent companies that it becomes a major factor, adding materially, as it must, to the cost of the insurance of the 7,700,000 policyholders of seventeen 3 per cent companies—a very considerable element in every State of the Union.

On any basis of comparison—assets, insurance in force, total income, payments to policyholders—the 3 per cent companies are now paying larger Federal taxes than the 3½ per cent companies, and if the action taken should become final their payments would be so increased as to create a most inequitable situation.

Under the action taken 54 companies, representing 91.1 per cent of the assets of all United States companies, would fare as follows:

Thirty-seven 3½ per cent companies, with $8,567,735,450 assets, would have their taxes increased $5,526,535.60, or 117.6 per cent.

Seventeen 3 per cent companies, with $7,619,081,585 assets, would have their taxes increased $8,330,688.29, or 180.2 per cent.

This letter is put on your desk this morning to assist you in bringing about a rehearing, if you can see your way clear to do so before the opportunity is passed.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES LEE LOOMIS,
Chairman Federal Tax Committee.

PROPOSED REPEAL OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—EDITORIAL BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial released on yesterday, which is to be printed on May 4, 1932, in the Nation, which is edited by Oswald Garrison Villard, formerly a very strong advocate of prohibition, but who now believes that the eighteenth amendment should be repealed.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPEAL THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—THE NATION CELEBRATED LIBERAL JOURNAL EDITED BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, DECLARES PROHIBITION A FAILURE THAT CAN ONLY BE RIGHTED BY REPEAL

The Nation has been slow to come to the belief that the repeal of the eighteenth amendment is inevitable and necessary. It is now firmly of the opinion that every effort should be made to remove this issue from the arena of immediate politics by reverting to the condition which existed prior to the adoption of the amendment. While never for a moment, as our readers are well aware, in favor of legislating goodness into people, we have been among those who felt that prohibition, in its first years, bestowed untold benefits upon the working classes and contributed a great deal to the postwar prosperity of the American people by depriving the brewers and distillers of their share of the purchasing power of the Nation and turning it into other and better channels. For this and other reasons we have clung to the hope that there would be a genuine and honest attempt to enforce prohibition and that after it was no longer smart to violate the laws conditions would steadily improve. Here and there we do see signs of improvement, but on the whole, as the years have slipped by, conditions have steadily grown worse, so far as the violation of the law is concerned. The Nation, therefore, is compelled to join those who favor the reamendment of the Constitution, admitting that a false start has been made and the step must be retraced.

We have come to our decision to-day to join the forces urging repeal primarily because of the now entirely demonstrated hopelessness of obtaining enforcement from the Government in this era of a collapsing capitalistic system. At least until the Government is largely made over, there is obviously no chance of an efficient or honest effort to enforce the law or to arouse public opinion to its support. The Government is to-day absorbed in saving itself and will be for a long time to come. Mr. Hoover is plainly as much of a hypocrite in the White House on this issue as were Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Harding. The best that can be said for him is that he, like his predecessors, can not control his own officials; that the Prohibition Service and parts of the judiciary are so corrupt and so false to their oaths of office as to make it impossible for the Chief Executive to obtain their fidelity to their trust. We believe that, given an Executive who deemed law enforcement a prime duty, and a civil service of the honesty and incorruptibility of the Germans before the war and of the British at this hour, it would be possible to secure an enforcement which would practically do the trick. To-day the President keeps up the false pretense of enforcement, as he misrepresented the wet Wickersham report, makes no effort to eliminate politics in the enforcement service, is oblivious to growing corruption, growing defiance of the fundamental law and the Constitution itself. There is no prospect that his successor will do anything else. Under the circumstances, what is there left but to ask for repeal?

We hope that both the parties in their coming conventions will let the world know exactly where they stand, that they will not be content with vague generalities, that they will definitely demand repeal. As our readers will recall, we have for years been urging a popular referendum upon this subject—that referendum which the dry forces now seem graciously disposed to grant. We had envisaged the taking of a poll of all the voters of the country by the Congress; we have believed that it could be authorized at a single session, and that Congress could provide such a nation-wide referendum without having to go through the process of amending the Constitution. A Congress which could vote at the outbreak of war for a census of all our youth between certain ages and could create almost overnight the machinery for registering those liable to the draft, could also find a way of achieving a referendum on the prohibition question in a short time, provided that it and the administration seriously undertook to do so. We are now, however, prepared to go farther. We urge that the Congress take advantage of the amending clause of the Constitution, vote a substitute amendment abolishing the eighteenth, and call upon the several States to ratify this change, not by their legislatures but by conventions specially elected for the purpose of passing upon this question and upon no other.

This is a device never yet utilized by the Congress, which has heretofore asked ratification of amendments in the other constitutional way—that is, through ratification by three-quarters of the legislatures of the Union. It has the obvious advantage that delegates to such conventions need only answer one question: "Are you for repeal or are you against it; are you wet or dry?" There could be no equivocating, no hiding behind other issues, for no other could come before these conventions. There would thus be offered to the voters of the States a genuine referendum. If they were opposed to revocation through the recall of the eighteenth amendment, they could make it plain by electing dry delegates to such conventions.

Should the conventions decide in favor of retaining the amendment, there would be nothing left, we admit, but to continue the process of education until reform was achieved. As far back as April 17, 1929, the Nation said editorially that the "existing condition is intolerable," that there must either be enforcement or repeal. Since that time conditions have grown so unspeakably worse that there appears to us to-day to be no alternative to repeal. That does not mean that we are to turn the country over to the saloon or to the liquor traffic. Practically ever since the Nation was founded in 1865 its editors have looked upon the drink traffic as one of the greatest of evils and have hoped for the day when it would be so limited, if not abolished, as to end the horrible waste of human lives and treasure which the old saloon system involved. We shall continue to fight for rigid control and for the reeducation of the country in the direction of temperance. But for the moment this end must be subordinated to the question of repeal, and so must the question of what system shall take the place of the present rule by bootleggers. The one and only thing to-day is so to mass public opinion that the party conventions will act and after them the Congress—both, we hope, before the coming summer ends. The slate must be wiped clean before the new start is made.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF POWER COMPANIES IN CALIFORNIA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Franklin Hichborn delivered at the public-ownership conference in Los Angeles and published in Public Ownership for January, 1932, entitled "Political Activities of the Power Trust in California."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

From the business revival following the Civil War, down to the present day, California has, with rare intervals of successful resistance by the people, been under the political domination of state-embracing public utilities privately owned. For the quarter of a century prior to the San Francisco earthquake and fire of 1906, this domination was monopolized by the organization popularly known as the Southern Pacific machine. California was then known as the Southern Pacific plantation—and plantation it was, exploited to the last cent on the basis of all the traffic would bear. The stories of the unsuccessful revolts against this railroad domination of State affairs make one of the most amazing chapters of American political history. One of these unsuccessful revolts is made the basis of Frank Norris's novel, the Octopus; a novel as significant could be based on any one of them.

EARLY STRUGGLES WITH UTILITY GIANTS

Slowly, imperceptibly, during the 10 years preceding the San Francisco fire, new utility forces were building up in California. The Western Pacific, fighting to enter the State, found itself blocked by the political power of the Southern Pacific. The telephone, from a toy, became a public-utility giant. Successful experiments with hydroelectric development established the most powerful utility of them all—the power company. But none of these, with the possible exception of the Western Pacific, had become significant in California State politics when the final revolt against corporation political domination of the State—1905–1910—culminated in the defeat of the Southern Pacific machine and the election of HIRAM W. JOHNSON, governor. JOHNSON'S slogan had been "Kick the Southern Pacific out of the State government." The chief objective of the movement was an effective railroad commission, with the power and the will to safeguard the public against railroad extortion. "I trust," said Governor JOHNSON in his inaugural address, "that none of us will be terrified by the threat of resort to the courts that follows the instant a railroad extortion is resented or attempted to be remedied." Few had any thought that the railroad commission would deal with any other utility than railroads. But even as the railroad commission act was being written, the new utilities, particularly the power companies, were digging in, laying the foundation of the political machine which dominates the State to-day. This present-day machine, now at the full tide of its power, by comparison, makes the Southern Pacific political organization, smashed 20 years ago, look like a plaything of amateurs.

POWER COMPANIES WORM THEIR WAY IN

The group which came into political power with the defeat of the Southern Pacific machine was in the main comparatively young men. JOHNSON himself had just turned 40. It was not long before it became quite apparent that anyone with influence with the new administration could have most lucrative employment with the utility corporations. Particularly was this true of the power companies. Some of the most important of power-company officials in California to-day found their opportunity by a job with the utility, based on their supposed influence with the new reform administration. Under this system the frequency with which railroad commissioners and their subordinates "step up" from the comparatively small pay of the regulating commission to the decidedly good pay of the regulated utilities has led to the dubbing of the commission as a school for the education of utility executives.

GOVERNOR PARDEE'S WARNING

As early as the Pardee administration, 1903–1907, Governor Pardee sounded unheeded warning against letting the water resources of the State fall into the hands of private monopoly. JOHNSON recognized the danger, and in his inaugural address warned against it.

"In the abstract," said the governor, "all agree on the policy of conservation. It is only when we deal with conservation in the concrete that we find opposition to the enforcement of the doctrine enunciated originally by Gifford Pinchot and Theodore Roosevelt. Conservation means development, but development and preservation; and it would seem that no argument should be required on the question of preserving, so far as we may, for all of the people those things which naturally belong to all. The great natural wealth of water in this State has been permitted, under our existing laws and lack of system, to be misappropriated and to be held to the great disadvantage of its economical development. The present laws in this respect should be amended. If it can be demonstrated that claims are wrongfully or illegally held, those claims should revert to the State. A rational and equitable code and method of procedure for water conservation and development should be adopted."

CONSERVATION BILLS BEATEN

But nothing was done at the 1911 session. Two years later, however, at the 1913 session, a water conservation bill backed by former Gov. George C. Pardee, Francis J. Heney, and other progressives, was enacted. The utilities held this measure up under the referendum. But at the November election of 1914 the voters upheld this measure at the polls. The water conservation commission which it provided was thereupon appointed. But the purposes of the progressive advocates of this measure have no more been carried out than have the purposes of the progressive advocates of the railroad commission act, now known as the public utilities act. The power companies have kept right on acquiring valuable water rights, which it was the purpose of the 1913 legislature and the Johnson administration to reserve for the use and benefit of all the people.

JOHNSON found himself as powerless to protect the interests of the public against the exploiters of the State's water resources as Pardee had been eight years before. It was not until 10 years after JOHNSON'S inaugural (1921) that another attempt was made to save to the people the wealth of their water resources.

LEAGUE OF MUNICIPALITIES TAKES UP THE FIGHT

At the 1921 session of the legislature, a bill sponsored by the League of California Municipalities was introduced by Senator M. B. Johnson. The purpose of this bill was to enable the people to escape the waste, extravagance, and expensive financing of private development of hydroelectric power.

By 1921 the present dominating State machine had become a decided factor in State affairs. The Johnson bill met with the effective opposition of the extensive lobby which the power companies and affiliated corporations maintain at Sacramento. Failing to defeat it in the Senate, where it passed with but 1 vote recorded against it, the power-company group opposed it in the assembly. There they succeeded in defeating it by indirection.

MEASURE KILLED IN COMMITTEE

The assembly committee to which the measure had been referred, neglected to return it to the assembly for action. The measure's proponents thereupon introduced a resolution requiring the committee to report it back. Forty-one votes were required to carry this resolution. The power company lobby's opposition was strong enough to hold the affirmative vote down to 37, 4 less than the number required for the resolution's adoption. The bill was held in committee; the assembly was given no opportunity to pass upon it.

In this way the Johnson bill for the conservation of the State's water resources prevented from becoming law, and the first serious attempt to break the power companies' strangle hold upon California defeated.

California has, however, a remedy for such success of corporation interference with the legislature—the initiative.

After adjournment of the legislature in 1921, representatives of the League of California Municipalities and other groups that had become interested met with representative citizens from all parts of the State to submit a water-conservation and hydroelectric-development measure to the people under the initiative.

THE CALIFORNIA WATER AND POWER ACT

The services of the best engineers, attorneys, and financial experts available were secured. These united in preparing the so-called California water and power act.

In effect this measure applied the Ontario plan of hydroelectric development to California, modified, of course, to conform with local conditions. It provided the necessary machinery for carrying out the work and a practical plan for financing the undertakings under it.

Gifford Pinchot, with a world reputation as an expert in such matters, declared the measure to be the most effective of the kind ever drawn. Congressman William Kent, thoroughly informed on California's water problem, declared himself as enthusiastic as Pinchot regarding it. Informed opinion throughout the State regarded the bill as the most effective that could be drawn. The measure was in due course submitted to the people.

The number of signatures necessary to have the measure put on the ballot for the November, 1922, election was completed in December, 1921.

POWER COMPANIES' TERRIFIC OPPOSITION

Immediately thereafter, as though by magic, organized opposition to the measure developed from one end of the State to the other. Overnight well-financed societies, with thoroughly equipped publicity, engineering, legal, and research departments, sprang into being. These either disclaimed connection with the power companies or were silent when charges of power-company support and affiliation were brought against them.

In the northern part of the State the principal organization was the Greater California League, ostensibly laboring for a greater California. In the south was the People's Economy League, its slogan being "Economy in State affairs." These two organizations, broadly speaking, covered the State. There were, too, numerous local organizations that came into being with the two larger groups. It soon developed that, in spite of their high-sounding names, the one purpose of these organizations was to defeat the water and power act. The campaign which they carried on against it was unparalleled in the history of California politics.

HOW MEASURE WAS DENOUNCED

The measure was denounced as bolshevistic, calculated to bring ruin upon the State; the most extraordinary misrepresentations of its provisions were made; its supporters were ridiculed and vilified; speakers went about the State denouncing it; every mail carried pamphlets opposing it; expensive newspaper advertising was directed against it.

To an extraordinary degree banks, bonding houses, newspapers, chambers of commerce, civic organizations joined in the cry raised by the Greater California League, the People's Economy League, and kindred organizations that the water and power act was bolshevistic, socialistic, would prove ruinous to the State; that it would mean financial and political disaster; that the Ontario project had proved a "flat, abject, and dismal failure"; that California could not afford to embark upon such a desperate enterprise.

Quite as extraordinary as this propaganda from financial and social groups was the opposition of leaders of organizations that had indorsed, or could be expected to indorse, the policy of public ownership of water and power.

The State federation of labor and labor unions generally, for example, indorsed the bill. But a few weeks before the election, P. H. McCarthy, for years State president of the building trades council, came out strongly in opposition to the measure.

San Francisco is committed to the policy of public ownership of such utilities. But San Francisco officials in the pay of the city stumped the State in opposition to the act. Finally, the Civic League of Improvement Clubs, an organization that included most of the civic bodies of San Francisco, declared against it. Social leaders prominent in women's club activities went from social gathering to social gathering urging that the measure be defeated. (Official verification of these and other similar statements will be found in the hearings of the Federal Trade Commission, 70th Cong., 1st sess., S. Doc. 92; exhibits to pts. 10–16, pp. 466–571 and 620.)

WHO FINANCED THE FIGHT?

The political affiliations of some of the leading opponents of the measure also had important bearing upon the campaign.

The president of the Greater California League, for example, was Mr. Eustace Cullinan. Cullinan had for years posed as a leading progressive. He was a political associate of United States Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. Cullinan took exceptional care throughout the campaign to emphasize his connection with the JOHNSON group.

The supporters of the measure realized, of course, that such an amazing campaign was costing some one enormously. Suspicion naturally fell upon the power companies. But opponents in the open either denied that they were being paid by the power companies or were silent under charges that they were being so paid.

On one occasion a speaker for the bill in a small town in the San Joaquin Valley drove an opposition speaker from the hall by showing that this opposition speaker had come to the meeting in a car owned by a power-company official.

At Sacramento, what came very near developing into a fist fight resulted from a charge that the opposition speaker was in power-company pay. Both the San Joaquin Valley and the Sacramento speakers had denied that they were in any way connected with a power company. Later, when exposure of the methods used to defeat the act was made before a committee of the State senate, it was proved conclusively that they both had been well paid by the power companies for their work. The same was discovered to be true of San Francisco officials who had campaigned against the measure.

Eustace Cullinan coolly set forth in the San Jose News of March 20, 1922, that the question of his compensation was not in issue.

Generally speaking, the public was in ignorance that the power companies were financing the extraordinary campaign against the act. Nevertheless, the leaders of the support of the measure, without being able to prove it, were convinced that the power companies were financing the opposition. With these leaders the belief was general that the power companies were not only paying Cullinan and the other speakers for the opposition but even the social leaders who, at parties and receptions, were busy spreading opposition propaganda. But there was no direct evidence of this, and the public was slow to believe such a condition of men and women of the political and social standing of those involved.

POWER COMPANIES FILE NO REPORT

The supporters of the measure recognized that their remedy was in the provision of the California law which required that within 10 days preceding an election there be filed with the secretary of state a complete statement of receipts and itemized expenditures of groups organized to support or oppose initiative measures. With this filing, which the law directed should be made before election, the financing of the Greater California League, People's Economy League, and associated organizations would, as the law contemplated, be made public. The mooted question of whether Mr. Cullinan and his associates were acting without compensation, as some of them claimed, and the rest of them permitted to be inferred, or were paid by the power companies for their stand, would then be answered.

The organization that was supporting the act filed, as the law required, its statement of receipts and expenditures down to the last postage stamp. It had nothing to conceal.

But the Greater California League, the People's Economy League, and the other organizations that were opposing the act made no filing at all. Not an organization or individual connected with the opposition to the measure observed the law. The inference was, of course, that no money had been expended to defeat the act. The supporters of the measure knew, of course, that such a conclusion was absurd. But the general public, not so well informed, inclined to the belief that, after all, the power companies had probably had little to do with the Greater California League and kindred organizations, and that the rumors that P. H. McCarthy, Eustace Cullinan, persons prominent socially, and heads of civic bodies were getting power-company money for their work in opposition to this measure were without foundation.

On election day workers in opposition to the measure appeared at practically every voting place in the State. The supporters of the measure were utterly unable to meet such opposition. The campaign of misrepresentation of the measure, which had been carried on for a year, had raised the doubt in the minds of tens of thousands of voters. The polling-place organization on election day completed the job. The California water and power act was defeated after the most bitterly contested political struggle ever staged in California. And it had been done in such a way that probably not one in five hundred California voters in any way connected the power companies with the campaign for its defeat.

THE STATE SENATE INVESTIGATES

The California Legislature met at Sacramento in January following the November election at which the water and power act had been defeated. State Senator Herbert C. Jones, of San Jose, a progressive State leader, chairman of the senate judiciary committee, the most important committee of the legislature, offered a resolution calling for thorough investigation of all expenditures made in initiative campaigns at the election of the previous November, providing for a committee to conduct the investigation, and authorizing the committee to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and compel witnesses to testify.

The Jones resolution came as a complete surprise to the members of the power-company lobby. At once they busied themselves against it, but their efforts failed. The resolution was adopted, and the committee appointed. The committee consisted of Senators Herbert C. Jones, chairman; M. B. Harris, of Fresno; H. C. Nelson, of Humboldt; Walter Eden, of Orange; and J. A. Romminger, of Long Beach.

Jones and Harris at the previous election had supported the water and power act; Nelson, Eden, and Romminger had opposed it.

The committee inquired into the expenditures of all the campaign for and against all the measures which were on the ballot at the 1922 election. But the testimony that startled the State, that filled the newspapers with first-page sensations for weeks, came from the lips of the opponents of the water and power act. With the testimony of these opponents of the water and power act spread over the State, it was well understood why they had been backward about making public their statement of receipts and expenditures as the California law required.

WHAT THE INVESTIGATION REVEALED

The committee was fortunate in that Eustace Cullinan was one of the first witnesses called.

Cullinan apparently thought that he had been very clever and wanted the public to know about it. The story he glibly told opened the way for general exposure of the amazing political methods of the organized power companies in California.

Cullinan testified that six power companies of northern California, through the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., had placed in his hands $244,941.04 to be used in the name of the Greater California League in opposition to the water and power act. For his services—over a period of about 11 months—he received $25,000. His chief assistant, William D'Egilbert, who went about the State as a farmer opponent of the measure, received $11,000. (The full text of the report of the California senate committee appears in the hearings of the Federal Trade Commission, 70th Cong., 1st sess., S. Doc. 92; exhibits to pts. 10–16, pp. 419–424.)

The People's Economy League, operating in the same way in southern California under the direction of Herbert L. Cornish, was provided by the power companies with $107,605. Cornish received for the 11 months' campaign $26,000.

As these amazing revelations came from these men the public was on edge to find the compensation that went to labor leader P. H. McCarthy, social leaders, civic leaders, and other prominent persons who had worked against the measure. But nothing concerning their compensation could be drawn from underlings of the type of Cullinan and Cornish.

PAID LABOR LEADER $10,000

Finally, when Wiggerton E. Creed, then president of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., was on the stand, to meet a question put to him by the committee, he consulted a list. Later John A. Britton, then general manager of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., testifying, also drew out a list and consulted it. In answer to a question whether the list was the same as that consulted earlier by Creed, Britton answered in the affirmative. The committee examined the list. Heading it was McCarthy's name and his compensation, $10,000; and the names of many others politically and socially prominent who had opposed the measure, with the compensation allowed them. The officials of the power companies had dealt with these people directly and not through the medium of underlings.

McCarthy had been employed less than three months before election "to circulate," as Britton put it, "among his friends and acquaintances, and to educate the labor element that he represented against the act."

CIVIC LEAGUES SUBSIDIZED

Another on Britton's list was George Skaller, executive of the San Francisco Civic League of Improvement Clubs, who had received $6,000—$4,000 for his league and $2,000 for himself—for, as Mr. Britton testified, "services similar to those rendered by Mr. McCarthy."

Of how social leaders were handled, this manager of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. testified that one woman, prominent in club and social circles, had been paid $1,000 because of her "extended acquaintance; familiarity with women's clubs." "It occurred to me," went on Britton, "it would be a good opportunity to get an entrée into these clubs through her, to educate the women, particularly on the viciousness of the act, and she did her duty well, too—I'll tell you she did her duty very well, as the vote shows there."

The executive of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., who gave that testimony, was at the time receiving $24,000 a year for his services. His grateful company soon after increased his annual compensation to $30,000.

In addition to all this, it was shown that the several power companies carried on independent campaigns of their own.

Most of you have, for example, heard of the so-called Murray report, so admirably answered by Sir Adam Beck, in which Murray attempts to make it appear that the Ontario project is a monumental failure.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Co. joined with the Southern California Edison Co. in paying Murray $5,583.86 to spend a single month in California (October) to campaign against the water and power act. Murray was not much of a success as an orator. He made only one or two speeches and stopped.

Creed stated on the stand that "the Ontario scheme" was so thoroughly exposed without him, that "it" (the Ontario scheme) was "sort of a dead thing." So, according to Creed, Murray was not needed. But he had come to California much heralded as an authority on the Ontario "failure," nevertheless, and received the $5,583.86 which the power companies had, through Creed, agreed to give him for his month's work. I have these statements on Mr. Creed's sworn testimony before the Senate committee. Incidentally, the power companies bought and distributed in California a large number of copies of Murray's now discredited report on the Ontario project.

"MISLEADING AND DECEPTIVE" METHODS

The manner in which the corporations' enormous campaign fund was handled was perhaps the most extraordinary feature of their amazing campaign. It is best described in the words of the report of the Jones committee, which will be found published in full in the Journal of the California Senate for 1923:

"In reference to the methods employed in connection with the campaigns on some of the propositions on the ballot, the committee found they were such as to have the effect of misleading and deceiving the voter. This arises, for example, out of the use of high-sounding, patriotic names under which the real identity of the interested parties and actual proponents or opponents is disguised. While many campaign committees selected names that fairly indicated their purpose, others selected designations which gave the voter no indication as to the real purpose or nature of the organization. The most conspicuous example of the latter was the use of the name 'Greater California League' by the opponents of the water and power act. Such a name readily gives the impression of being a promotion organization which every citizen in California would feel free to join, and having nothing in its name to indicate that it was a political-campaign organization.

"The testimony before the committee showed that the Greater California League was in reality merely the name under which Mr. Eustace Cullinan, employed by the power companies, conducted the campaign against the water and power act in northern California.

"The following extracts from Mr. Cullinan's testimony indicate its actual identity:

"'The Greater California League never had control of the money [campaign contributions] at all. I put that money in the bank as I received it to an account called "The Greater California League," but no one had access to that account except me. * * * It was like most of these political groups or committees * * * never had a meeting. * * * I appointed myself president. I was employed by the power companies, through Mr. John S. Drum * * * and met with myself, after the employment, and organized the Greater California League.'"

OVER A HALF MILLION CAMPAIGN FUND

The committee traced and tagged $501,505.68 which the power companies had expended in this single campaign. But that the committee had failed to get to the bottom of those expenditures was recognized. Testimony brought out before the Federal Trade Commission has thrown more light on that campaign. The California Senate committee, for example, failed to uncover the work of the Hofer publicity agency operating out of Oregon, through which the power groups expend enormous sums for publicity. That particular exposure came through the Federal Power Commission. Also through the Federal Power Commission came exposure of the methods employed by power-company executives to keep the banks in line for power-company policies and purposes.

It seems that the California power companies, in combating the enlightened self-interests of the people of California, had shown themselves so efficient that power companies of Eastern States looked to the California groups for guidance and advice.

HOW THEY LINED UP THE BANKERS

President A. W. Robertson, of the Philadelphia Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., for example, wrote President A. F. Hockenbeamer, of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., as to the handling of banks. President Hockenbeamer graciously replied to President Robertson with illuminating illustrations. President Robertson thought the advice so good that he passed it on to President H. T. Sands, of the National Electric Light Association, commenting that "the method outlined in this correspondence appeals to me as being perhaps the finest way to create and maintain cordial relations with our friends the bankers." President Robertson then goes on to say that "In our Pittsburgh activities we have tried to follow such a scheme, although not on so extensive a scale as carried out in Mr. Hockenbeamer's organization."

From the National Electric Light Association this suggestive correspondence fell into the hands of investigators of the Federal Trade Commission, to be published in a public document. As public property it should do much good.

SAY IT WITH DEPOSITS

President Hockenbeamer's plan for handling the bankers is simplicity itself. In the fine, terse language of the successful business man, President Hockenbeamer told President Robertson that "as a practical incentive to get them [the bankers] to work with us, there is no substitute for deposits."

"A worth-while account," President Hockenbeamer then goes on to say, "has, therefore, been the keynote of our policy, and, to assure its application, it is our practice to regulate balances in country banks from the head office. I may add, in passing, that we have at this time (November 11, 1927) accounts with 230 country banks scattered all over our territory, and while our policy keeps an average of around a million and a half dollars tied up in balances in these country depositories, we believe it is well worth while—first, because the service they render to us as bankers is worth something; and, secondly, because it cements their friendship and cooperation. Incidentally, we require no interest on these deposits."

In the ordinary course of business the interest which the banks could reasonably have paid, as to an ordinary depositor, which unquestionably they would have paid, would have been 2 per cent, or $30,000 a year on the $1,500,000 tied up in those country banks. Such was the price of the "practical incentive" to insure California banks working with California power companies.

During the campaign for the water and power act one of the most difficult features of the opposition to understand was that of the country banks. In replying to the country bankers and similar opponents, Mayor D. W. Carmichael, of Sacramento, for years president of the California Real Estate Association, 12 years president of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, pointed out:

"Any real-estate man or banker or big business man who fights the water and power act is fighting his own individual future welfare. He is trying to block a program which will give California a fuller development and greater prosperity than the State can have by any other process—a prosperity in which all classes will participate."

President Hockenbeamer in his correspondence with President Robertson on "the practical incentive to get country bankers to work with us" throws considerable light on the opposition of the bankers, which was so puzzling to Mr. Carmichael and other forward-looking Californians. Seeking practical example of how well the "saying it with deposits" works, President Hockenbeamer took as example the bankers' opposition to the water and power act:

"On the whole," writes President Hockenbeamer to President Robertson, "the relations with our bankers are about as cordial as they possibly could be. We have had occasion to test their friendliness on a number of occasions and they have never failed us. During our two big campaigns against the so-called water and power act—a scheme to put California in the power business with an initial issue of half a billion of bonds—they literally sent out hundreds of thousands of personal letters and pieces of literature to their depositors and stockholders, as well as campaigning against the act personally."

BANKERS CAME CHEAPER THAN LABOR LEADERS

The basis of the California power companies' policy with the banks—President Hockenbeamer in his letter to President Robertson states, "My impression is that the other power companies of California follow pretty much the same policies as I have above outlined"—is the depositing of large sums of money for which no interest to depositor is required. As has been seen, on the $1,500,000 used in this way by the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., reasonable return to the company would have been $30,000 a year, or on the average of $130.80 to each bank. For three months each bank profited under this "practical incentive to work with the power companies" on the average $32.61.

When, in their campaign against the water and power act, the power companies wanted the assistance of a prominent labor leader for three months they paid P. H. McCarthy $10,000. Apparently bankers come very much cheaper than labor leaders.

President Hockenbeamer went to some pains to prevent his plan for handling country bankers falling into profane, worldly hands. "We have," wrote President Hockenbeamer to President Robertson, "already been suspected of undue connivance with bankers."

President Hockenbeamer is quite right. For long there has been that suspicion out here in California.

HUMBLE GRATITUDE OF THE BANKERS

I would that time permitted me to present the expressions of gratitude from the 230 banks for those free deposits upon which in the ordinary course of business at 2 per cent they would have paid $32.61 a quarter. A few samples will suffice:

First National Bank of Oroville: "While we appreciate the action of your executive committee and interpret its action that our efforts of handling the account in a manner to merit your approval have been successful, your kind words go further. They create an increased desire for opportunity to make our service of great value to you."

We have heard of a type of men, otherwise unpleasant, who are kind to their wives. There is some good in everything. Power companies are kind to little banks.

Bank of Italy, Rideou-Smith Branch, Oroville: "We very muchly appreciate the kindly thoughts expressed by you, for it is very pleasant to know that you are one of our many satisfied customers.

"Little expressions of appreciation and kindness are always welcome and make 'the long road' more easy to travel."

Who would have thought that $32.61 a quarter would go so far in "making the long road more easy to travel" for a grateful bank?

Mercantile Trust Co., Oakland, Calif.: "We appreciate the very attractive account which you have carried with us and have endeavored at all times to give a character of service which would justify a continuance of the same. It is a satisfaction to the writer that he has been able to reciprocate recently in a rather definite way as is already known by your Mr. Newbert and Mr. Furniss of your East Bay offices."

Mercantile Trust Co., Petaluma: "We assure you we appreciate this courtesy and will endeavor at all times to render you the best of service. Kindly feel free to command us at any time in any way we can be of assistance to your association."

And so on, and so on, through many pages of sloppy, mushy gratitude for that $32.61 free interest a quarter. It all goes to show how very "practical" and "incentive" $32.61 a quarter, $10.87 a month, can be made to be when put in the right place.

Nor have the state-wide campaigns of the power companies been confined to heading off public ownership. Their successful campaigns for control of the legislature, to defeat men for reelection who yield neither to persuasion nor "practical incentive," make a story in themselves. Their state-wide campaigns in matters of taxation have been astonishingly successful. The following from a resolution introduced by State Senator Herbert C. Jones (see Senate Journal for April 22, 1931, pp. 13–14) indicates something of the fruits of the propaganda on the tax problem:

"Whereas the report of the California Tax Commission, 1927–28, sets forth that on the basis of the 1.73 ad valorem rate levied against general property the gas and electric companies would have been paying a 10.25 per cent gross income tax instead of the 7.5 per cent tax actually paid, the difference in the State revenues actually collected under the lower rate and those that would have been collected under the higher rate being $10,052,593 for the years 1929–30, etc."

POLITICALLY INTRENCHED IN LEGISLATURE

So well intrenched were the power companies and their political allies at Sacramento at the last legislative session, and so effective has been their state-wide propaganda against any increase in the taxation of banks and utility companies, that nothing was done to compel these large property-owning groups to undertake their proportionate share of the tax burden. Conservative estimates place the amount of State taxes which the power companies and their political allies escaped during the last biennium and will escape during the present biennium at above $42,000,000.

FIGHTING MUNICIPAL, DISTRICT, AND LOCAL PROJECTS

Nor have the political activities of these corporations been confined to state-wide campaigns. We find them meddling politically in practically every community. At Sacramento they oppose bond issues to bring pure water to that city. At San Francisco they interfere with the Hetch Hetchy project; at Modesto they harass the Don Pedro development as they harass the department of power here at Los Angeles. Records on file at the railroad commission show the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co.'s fight against the municipal power bureau has, in efforts to defeat bond issues for municipal power development, totaled expenditures of $186,163.49 from this company alone. In like endeavor to handicap Los Angeles municipal power development, the Southern California Edison Co. has expended enormous amounts. At the 1927 bond election alone this Edison Co., according to the railroad commission, spent $40,277.38 to defeat the bonds. At that election the Los Angeles Gas Co. expended an additional $51,297.93. These staggering figures relate to moneys directly expended and do not include the time of regular employees spent in electioneering.

The demoralizing effect of all this upon the State and upon the political subdivisions of the State can scarcely be overestimated. Most seriously is it reflected in the State legislature. There the successful opposition to able and public-spirited men and the support of the weak and docile by the power companies and their political allies has reduced the legislative body to a condition where it has become little more than a rubber stamp for the allied interests, of which the power companies have become by far the most potent group.

Next winter the legislature will be called into extra session to do two things that will affect every man, woman, and child in California above the pauper stage:

(1) Rubber stamp a tax plan which is being worked out by the tax experts of power companies, banks, and railroads to meet the threatened deficit in the State treasury due to the failure of large taxpaying groups to bear their proportionate share of the tax burden.

(2) Rubber stamp a plan of water development.

Mr. Bartlett has shown you how, 21 years ago, San Francisco voted its first bonds to bring water from Hetch Hetchy to San Francisco (in a paper on Municipal Ownership in and Around San Francisco, to be published later). During 18 years of that period, James Rolph, jr., the same James Rolph, jr., who is now Governor of California, was mayor of San Francisco. The Hetch Hetchy water development has been carried on almost wholly during continuous Rolph administrations. And not one drop of Hetch Hetchy water has flowed into San Francisco water mains.

DEMORALIZING AND DESPOILING THE STATE

On the other hand, during the Rolph municipal administration, hydroelectric power was brought, at the expense of the people of San Francisco, from the Hetch Hetchy development to a point several miles outside of San Francisco. There that power could be turned into the ground or put on the wires of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. It was put on the wires of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. It is still there.

The mayor under whom this was done has by minority vote of the people of this State become Governor of California. Our state-wide elections are decided at the August primaries; the November election on state-wide candidates is a mere form.

Of the 58 counties of the State, Rolph at those August primaries carried 14 and lost 44. Of the 2,187,484 voters registered for those primaries, he received the votes of 377,390, or 17 per cent. Of the 1,301,847 voters eligible to vote at the Republican primaries, Rolph received the votes of 28 per cent. Of the 1,044,051 Republicans who voted at the August primaries, 36 per cent voted for Rolph; nearly 63 per cent voted against him. Rolph, with his 17 per cent of the registered electors, 28 per cent of the vote of the registered Republican electors, 36 per cent of the vote of the Republican electors who voted, secured the Republican nomination for governor, which here in California is equivalent to election.

This minority governor has appointed a commission to draft legislation for disposition of California's priceless water resources. This Rolph commission, numbering several hundred persons, takes in former governors, mayors of cities, Members of Congress, county supervisors, State bar, State press, and what not, in an advisory capacity. Among these advisors are to be noted former labor leader, P. H. McCarthy, whose $10,000 power-company fee in the water and power controversy has been referred to, and President A. F. Hockenbeamer, who as a successful educator in the art of handling bankers has been dwelt upon.

The power companies are out to use the State in a large way in the matter of water development, as they have in the Hetch Hetchy development used San Francisco in a comparatively small way. They propose to take any power which the people of California may develop to be sold back to the people of California at monopoly rates. They could not get that power under the water and power act. They fought and defeated the water and power act. California as a State to-day is unquestionably in danger of suffering in her water development what San Francisco as a city has suffered.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS BY THEODORE ROOSEVELT, GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD the inaugural address of Gov. Gen. Theodore Roosevelt at Manila, February 29, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, it is with a profound sense of the responsibility and importance of the tasks that lie before me that I greet you here to-day. We know one another only slightly, but I hope as time passes that the bonds of common service will strengthen between us, and that from them will grow an enduring respect and friendship.

Fine words and phrases are easy to coin. Fine deeds are infinitely more difficult of accomplishment. I shall ask you to judge what I may say to-day, therefore, not in terms of literary style but by my acts in the future.

The position of governor general to which I have been named, is one that I consider as honorable as any within the gift of the American people. It is in my conception administrative, and the political relationships between the Philippine Islands and the United States do not come within its scope. These are matters to be decided by the President and the United States Congress, in consultation with the representatives of the Filipino people.

Being administrative, the service I can render you will depend largely on the confidence and comprehension that exists between us. I, for my part, shall do my best to work with the citizens of the islands in carrying out the constructive policies that they have initiated and are developing.

We are fortunate now in having as head of the Nation a President of exceptionally wide experience. He has as intimate a knowledge of the East, its peoples, and its problems, as any other Chief Executive the Nation has had. He knows the Orient, not from having read of it in books or from having passed through it as a tourist, but from having worked there many years and having made many close friends there. You can count on his sympathy and comprehension.

The United States in the past has sent its best to the islands. Distinguished administrators from President Taft to Governor General Davis have labored here and have treasured the memories of their work with you among the proudest recollections of their lives. At their side have worked many other Americans, from able educators and scientists to engineers and accountants. Though it would be idle to say they have been right in every action, for that would not be human, we can say that they have spent themselves freely, with rare judgment and ability, and with no other thought than aiding your citizens. It has been my pleasure to know personally many of these gentlemen. It will be my endeavor to guide myself in such fashion as to live up to the ideal of service to the Filipino people that they have set. Your last Governor General, Mr. Davis, I saw repeatedly after his return to the United States, where we discussed at length policies and plans, in order that there might be no lack of continuity in the constructive work under way in the islands.

For years the Philippine Islands and the Filipino people have interested me greatly. It has been my privilege at various times to meet some of your distinguished citizens, and I have not merely studied the material condition of the islands but also your history and culture. I speak with knowledge, therefore, when I say that I have a great respect for the Filipino people, their achievements, character, and valor. Their character to me is epitomized in the aspirations and unselfish devotion of José Rizal, who combined lofty idealism, rare abilities, and practical patriotism.

You should justly be proud of your record. No part of the civilized globe has seen such progress during the last 30 years as these islands. Where one school flourished 30 years ago there are hundreds now, and the students have increased proportionately. Where there were but a few roads, many of which were impassable during the rainy season, the islands are now linked with as fine a system of communication as any country in the Tropics. The 300 miles of first-class thoroughfares in 1907 have grown to approximately 4,000 to-day. There are sanitary water systems in great centers where none were before. There are railroads, telephones, telegraph, and a dependable postal service. The young men and women at the insular universities are numbered by the thousands, and Filipinos of ability are making their mark in the higher branches of learning, scientific and theoretical, in the centers of learning all over the world. Other endeavors in health, agriculture, and economics have kept pace. A solid foundation has been laid on which to build the future happiness, both moral and material, of your people.

This has been accomplished in but one way—by teamwork. It is this that I shall strive to attain in my administration. Without it nothing can be done. With it everything is possible. I have had the pleasure of discussing with the members of your delegation in the United States the constructive internal policies that you are developing, and I feel confident that together we can make notable progress toward their realization.

All countries are in their essence the average of their citizens. A small group of brilliant men have never made any land permanently great. The well-being, moral stamina, and education of the rank and file of its citizens are what count most in every country.

There are three foundation stones on which these rest. The first of these is health. Without it there is no progress. A man shaking with fever, coughing from tuberculosis, or weak from lack of proper food and from intestinal parasites can not work or raise a proper family. A little child when undernourished can not avail himself fully of the opportunities offered by the school and falls the prey to any disease that may come. Therefore the health service of a nation is all-important and must be considered as one of the underlying policies to be developed.

The second is a sound system of laws, administered without fear or favor, laws based upon the rights of man, which deal equal justice to rich and poor. Every member of the community must enjoy the "right to live by no man's leave underneath the law." On such a system of laws administered by righteous judges, who consider neither private interest nor political advantage, is based personal liberty, the most treasured of human possessions. Where such a judicial system is lacking no form of government can achieve its end.

There are many lands throughout the world where the governments care nothing for the welfare of the poor and where the laws are interpreted by fear or favor. There the people have no protection and no personal liberty. There the rich arbitrarily take the poor man's carabao. When he goes to bed at night he never knows what outrage on his family or property may be perpetrated before morning dawns.

The American and Filipino peoples believe that the poor should be protected. Those autocratic governments do not recognize that the poor have rights. We believe that criticism of the Government is the right of any citizen and breeds reform and progress. They clap into prison, exile, or shoot anyone who protests an abuse. Their people have no conception of the personal liberty that is enjoyed by the humblest of the citizens here or in the United States.

A judicial system which guarantees true personal liberty stands with health in its importance to a people.

Third, and as vital as the two former, is education—education not for the few but for the many, education of a type that builds both morally and intellectually. The idea we are striving to realize has as its basis a school system where all children may have the opportunity for elementary education. That education should include practical or vocational training, as well as theoretical instruction. It should be of such a sort as to give to the children, when they leave school, the means whereby they can make for themselves happy, worth-while lives. It should give them aspirations for better things, and a keen interest in the affairs of their community, not merely in such as may affect them directly, but also in all affairs that touch on the well-being of their fellow citizens. It should be the root from which grows the tree of public opinion, on which all commonwealths depend for their success.

In all of these major policies I know that the Filipino people have made great strides. In all it will be my policy to work with you in every fashion that lies within my power, for I believe that the well-being of the average Filipino depends on them.

Our goal in agriculture and industrial development must be the well-being of the average Filipino. We must foster and protect the small farmer and the little business man, for they are the backbone of a nation.

The measure of strength of a country is not a few great estates, but a multitude of prosperous small independent holdings. A hundred little farm owners are far more valuable to a nation than one large plantation owner. I shall back to the limit the endeavors you have undertaken to secure for the little farmer clear title to his land, and to fence him with safeguards so that he may not be robbed thereof. We should plan in addition to increase the number of small holdings by pressing your policy of homesteading and by such other means as may be practical.

Through the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Commerce and other governmental organizations, we should continue to devise new means of bringing to the small farmer knowledge and aid. The islands' resources should be developed for the benefit of the Filipino people, and new policies should be judged primarily from this standpoint.

Above all, we should work to make the islands as close to self-sufficient agriculturally and industrially as circumstances permit. Gifted by nature with a diverse climate, a fertile soil, and great natural wealth, there is no reason why the islands should not grow the necessities of life for their own people. It is necessary that they should do so in order to form the proper economic basis for what the future holds. Our constant endeavor should be directed toward bringing this to pass.

All the work I have outlined takes money, and the islands, like the rest of the world, find themselves in straitened circumstances financially, due to the economic crisis in which all nations are engulfed. That means that if we are to maintain the necessary Government services we must exercise the strictest economy. Expenses that in better times might have been justified can not now be incurred. Above all, we must work for governmental efficiency, for that is the means whereby all nations can make the greatest practical economies. We must press the campaign you have initiated to eliminate inefficiency, duplication, or graft wherever they may be found, in order that the moneys saved thereby may be expended for the benefit of the average Filipino. Let us work together to make the Filipino government a model of efficiency for the rest of the world.

Important as material well-being is, it is not all, for things of the spirit are as important as things of the body. "Where there is no vision the people perish." At the same time that we are building economically we should develop and foster the cultural side. The Philippine Islands have a culture, deep-rooted in the past, a culture that springs from the songs and sayings of the people, as do all true cultures. It has flowered in the philosophical writings and poems of Rizal, in the paintings of Luna and Hidalgo, the statues of Tolentino, the music of countless singers and composers, and the achievements in different branches of learning of many Filipino men and women. It finds its natural center around the universities on the islands. It is a distinctive culture but broad as well, assimilating, as all true cultures should, what is best in the rest of the world—for genius knows no national boundary lines.

To me the Philippines of the future are an inspiring picture. They can be and should be a great center in tropical Asia, a center from which the surrounding countries can draw example and aid. I have spoken of health. Tropical diseases and health problems have not been studied as thoroughly as those of the colder climates. There is need that they should be. Here in the islands is already an excellent health service. It should grow and expand in the future until it serves not merely the islands, but by example the neighboring countries as well. Here might well be the recognized Asiatic school of tropical medicine, to which young men from other parts of the Orient come to study, and which in turn sends out its trained professors to teach other nations.

The same should hold true in agriculture, which is the major industry of the hotter climates. The Philippine Islands should be the Asiatic center of scientific tropical agriculture, where methods, plants, and diseases are studied, and whose experts are recognized the world over.

The advance of a people is indicated by the position that women hold in the community. The islands are a notable illustration of this truth. It is a splendid augury for the future to see the considerable part the women of the Philippines play in community affairs and social relationships.

This has brought its logical result—social-welfare work. History shows that this necessary part of community endeavor is generally attributable to the efforts of women. The government can do much, but the government itself can not do all. An important factor in building up any country is the action of its citizens to one another in their private capacity, their willingness to help one another. The individual who says he is not his brother's keeper and remains callously indifferent to the hardships and sufferings of his neighbors, is unworthy of citizenship. The Filipino people are known for their kind-heartedness and hospitality, and have undertaken successfully much work of this nature. There is room for still further effort, for welfare work is capable of infinite expansion. Through private organizations of the citizens of the islands we should strive to reach into every little home and better the conditions of life of mother and child.

My success in aiding you in the development of these policies will depend largely on the mutual understanding we can develop. I shall seek at all times the advice and counsel of the leaders, both political and intellectual. I shall welcome at all times the frank expression of constructive opinion and suggestions of any citizen. I am confident I shall obtain it. I trust I may obtain friendship as well.

At this moment it would be clearly inopportune for me to outline to you in detail any plans or thoughts that are in my mind. Though I have talked with many people and have read many books on conditions here, I have not seen those conditions myself, and I believe personal inspection is necessary to form sound conclusions. My plan is to start at once to familiarize myself with the islands and the problems. When that is done, and not until it is done, will I attempt to deal specifically with problems.

This is a most solemn moment in my life. Not only have I always had an abiding interest in the Filipino people, but the same held true of my father. When Governor of New York, he wrote to his intimate friend Senator Lodge that he did not wish to be a candidate for the Vice Presidency of the United States because his ambition was to be Governor General of the Philippines. I did not take the oath of office in the United States because I wanted to take it here before all of you. The Bible on which I am taking it is the one used by my father when he was sworn in as Governor of New York and afterwards as President of the United States. It is the same that I used to take the oath of office as Governor of Porto Rico. I am not taking this oath to-day merely with my lips.

ERADICATION OF GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 149) making funds available for grasshopper control.

Mr. REED. May the joint resolution be reported? Is it on the calendar?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the joint resolution be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 149) making funds available for grasshopper control, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the application of such methods of control of grasshoppers as, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be necessary, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals as the Secretary may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and for other expenses, the sum of $1,450,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture, of which sum not to exceed $8,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That except for general administration and supervision, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, expenditures under this appropriation shall be limited to the purchase and transportation of poisoned bait, or materials for its manufacture, and that the cooperating States shall be responsible for the local distribution and utilization of such bait, including full labor costs: Provided further, That, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, no part of this appropriation shall be expended for grasshopper control in any State until such State has provided the necessary organization for the cooperation herein indicated: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of farm animals, farm crops, or other property injured or destroyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. In case this joint resolution should be passed, what would be its effect on the appropriation already provided for in the agricultural appropriation bill which has been reported out of conference?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That could only be corrected by the adoption of a concurrent resolution after the passage of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if it is his intention, in case the joint resolution shall pass, to present a concurrent resolution which will take out of the agricultural appropriation bill the identical item?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CURTAILMENT OF LARGE INCOMES

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 204.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 204), submitted by Mr. LONG on the 21st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States, and that it accordingly does instruct the Senate Finance Committee, that it reform the revenue act now under consideration (H. R. 10236) so that no person shall have an annual income in excess of $1,000,000, and so that no person during his or her lifetime shall receive by gifts, inheritances, or other bequests more than $5,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Louisiana how it is proposed to prevent persons from having incomes in excess of $1,000,000, and how it is proposed that inheritances shall be limited to $5,000,000?

Mr. LONG. The resolution proposes that no man shall be permitted to earn an annual income of more than $1,000,000 a year, exclusive of taxes, and no man shall inherit legacies or receive gifts during his lifetime, exclusive of taxes, in excess of $5,000,000. It is proposed to put a limit on swollen fortunes in the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The idea is to take in the form of taxes all incomes in excess of $1,000,000, and to take in the form of inheritance taxes all amounts bequeathed in excess of $5,000,000?

Mr. LONG. All amounts in excess of $5,000,000; that is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution, but I do not give it my support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I suggest that if the Finance Committee keeps on as it is going, there is no possibility of anybody having an income of anything like a million dollars, and there is not going to be enough left for anybody to inherit anything like $5,000,000. So I think the Senator's apprehensions are almost groundless.

Mr. LONG. Then, the Senator will vote for my resolution?

Mr. REED. No; I think the resolution ought to be sent to the Committee on Finance first, and, if consent shall be given for its immediate consideration, I shall move that it be referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is the first notice I have had of the resolution. I wonder if the Senator will permit the resolution to go over a day so that we may have time to study its effect?

Mr. LONG. My only purpose in calling it up was that we might instruct the Finance Committee before it reports the pending tax bill.

Mr. BORAH. I shall not ask that the resolution go over if the Senator desires to urge it, because it is simply an instruction to the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I have never seen the resolution and have never read it. I understand it instructs the Finance Committee along certain lines.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; the Senate has been doing that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And the resolution proposes to direct the committee to report favorably on the proposal?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not agree to do that, and I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California objects.

Mr. LONG. Then, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 204 at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, which is not debatable.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion was rejected.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 88) to authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof was announced as first in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1663) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a commission on a national museum of engineering and industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ROSCOE MEADOWS

The bill (S. 2375) for the relief of Roscoe Meadows was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will withhold his objection for a moment, I should like to explain that for several weeks I have been objecting to that bill, but I have only recently had it made clear to me that my understanding of it was wrong. Meadows was a chaplain in the Navy during the World War, with a sort of temporary-regular status. Since the war it has been ruled by the Navy Department that he was not a regular officer and not entitled to the benefits accruing to a regular officer. The Veterans' Administration has ruled that he was not a temporary officer and is not entitled to any benefits from them. So he is left hanging in the air between the two organizations, getting relief from nobody, and he needs relief.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I gladly yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the recommendation of the department touching the bill?

Mr. REED. I do not know, but I think it is favorable. I can give the Senator the information in a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau says on page 2 of the report on the bill:

> It is believed that the committee will be able to judge for itself from the above report the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

And on page 4 of the report I find this statement, quoting the message sent to the Senate by Acting Secretary Jahncke:

> Inasmuch as this bill does not involve any expenditure of funds under the Navy Department, the Navy Department refrains from further comment or recommendation.

Mr. REED. The Navy Department has held that Meadows was not a regular Navy officer, and that is in line with its report. The Comptroller General has held that if he was anything he was a regular, and therefore he is not entitled to the relief that an emergency officer would receive.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it the purpose to give him the benefit of retirement?

Mr. REED. I am not sure as to that; he might receive the benefit of the emergency officers' retirement act.

Mr. KING. Then, for the present, I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. KING. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. One moment, Mr. President. This bill, being Order of Business No. 329, and also Orders of Business Nos. 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, and 414, were reported adversely. Owing to my absence, I was unable to appear before the committee in an attempt to justify the bills, and, if it is agreeable, I should like to have those several bills recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the several bills referred to by the Senator from California are recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The bills referred to, recommitted to the Committee on Finance, are as follows:

BILL PASSED OVER

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3377 notwithstanding the objection, in order that we may start the debate on the bill.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

So, Mr. BINGHAM's motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs with an amendment.

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as the motion to take up the Philippine independence bill was made, I presume, without any hope that we would pass the bill between now and 2 o'clock, I want to take a little time on another matter, if it will not be disagreeable to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator has said, I may state that the idea was that there were certain Senators who have quite a little in their systems in opposition to the bill, and I hoped that they might have the opportunity to get some of that opposition out of their systems this morning, so that we might approach the time when we would actually get the bill passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The pending bill has been placed on the legislative program, I think being made the fifth item, and I realize that there were some votes against taking it up at this time because Senators did not desire to interfere with the calendar to-day. But I really think that possibly we might get a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. BORAH. I am very much in favor of the independence of the Philippines, but there are a great many things in this bill which will take some time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Personally I am not opposed to having the bill taken up at this time, because it is a matter which will be debated, and the quicker we can get a number of the measures off the calendar which are now to be found on it the more certain it will be that we shall not be here all summer.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will yield, lest the Senator be unduly discouraged by the suggestion that we give way to the Philippine discussion, I may suggest that it will take at least half an hour for the clerk to read the substitute which is lying on the desk, and which I shall submit as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen the substitute. It will take more time than the reading.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is as good a time as any for reading the substitute.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire also to indicate that I have a substitute which I shall offer in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as well as the pending bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presumed there were certain things lying back of the pending bill on the calendar which had a great deal to do with the motion to take the Philippine bill up at this time.

I hold in my hand an address made by Charles A. Gill, who is superintendent of motive power of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Mr. Gill has spent some months in Russia. Certain self-styled patriotic societies are now engaged in warning the American people of the terrific conditions which prevail in Russia and the imminence of this country being taken possession of by the communists; therefore, I think it might be well to have the view of an intelligent and dispassionate, honest observer of the situation in that country. Mr. Gill says:

I have had the opportunity to cover approximately 25,000 miles of the territory between Archangel and the Black Sea and from the western border of Russia extending through Moscow to the Ural Mountains. Within this territory there are approximately 40 large cities, including Moscow, Leningrad, Vologda, Yaroslavl, Voronezh, Poltava, Odessa, Kiev, Kharkov, Rostov, Minsk, Dnepropetrovsk, Alexandrov, Kazan, and many rural districts. I have, therefore, had an unusual opportunity to witness personally the true situation of the country as a whole.

Speaking then of the labor situation, he said:

Labor turnover continues to be a great problem, as the average Russian desires to travel and see what is going on in the various parts of his country. Increased wages and more attractive living conditions are helping to solve this problem. However, labor turnover in some of the railroad shops with which I was connected was so great that it was necessary to offer premiums and other inducements to keep the men from leaving. We had a total of 200,000 men, divided between the back shops and roundhouses, and a total of over 1,084,000 men in all branches of railroad service, which represents one of the largest organizations in Russia. As I was closely connected with the details of the various departments, as well as with other American engineers who handled different departmental work from time to time, I can freely declare that there was absolutely no evidence of forced labor. From my general observations of labor conditions in the Soviet Union I can state that while in some respects these conditions differ from those in the United States the Russian worker is free at all times to quit his job and apply elsewhere for work.

Speaking of the trade situation, he said, as appears on page 7 of his address:

The purchase of a large amount of machine-tool equipment is necessary to expedite such a large building program, and it would seem to me our American manufacturers would be interested in securing their proportion of this business. In order to make this statement clear I would like to quote some figures issued by the British machine-tool manufacturers covering machine-tool exports to Russia:

	Tons	Value
1929	562	$499,180
1931 (9 months)	3,993	3,136,800

Orders placed in Germany by the Soviet Union during 1931, largely for machinery and equipment, amounted to $219,184,000, as compared with $135,060,000 in 1930, or a gain of 62 per cent. This increase was the result of better trade relations and a credit agreement between the two countries.

Reports published by the Amtorg Trading Corporation indicate that there is a continual falling off of Soviet purchases on the American market, due largely to the fact that more favorable terms can be secured elsewhere. During my stay in Russia I had the pleasure of recommending several million dollars' worth of machine tools for use in the various railroad shops. On the strength of my recommendations a commission visited the United States during the past year with authority to purchase this machinery, but due to the inability of American manufacturers to extend suitable credit to the Russians the business was tranferred to Germany and other countries. It is hard to understand such an attitude, in view of the fact that since 1923 the Soviet Government has purchased in America goods totaling over $600,000,000, and has never failed to meet its obligations when payment came due.

Mr. President, I have made some investigation with reference to trade between the people of our country and Russia since 1923. I have been unable to find where there was a single default in the trade agreements of Russia with reference to those in this country who were selling goods to Russia. I am advised that the agreements have been kept meticulously, and in no instance has there been complaint upon the part of our people.

Mr. Robert P. Lamont, jr., son of the United States Secretary of Commerce, has been for some time in Russia investigating conditions particularly with reference to the cattle-raising industry. In an interview published in the New York Times a few days ago he said:

LAMONT'S SON ASKS TRADE WITH RUSSIA—HE SAYS IN MOSCOW THAT THE COUNTRY OFFERS AMERICANS A VAST FOREIGN MARKET—SOVIET BACKS TWO EX-FOES—ACADEMIES ARE REPRIMANDED FOR DISMISSING PROFESSORS WHO ONCE OPPOSED THE RÉGIME

Moscow, April 20.—A conviction that American officials and business men should change their policy toward commerce with Soviet Russia was expressed to-day by Robert P. Lamont, jr., son of the United States Secretary of Commerce, after surveying the country's cattle-raising industry at the invitation of the Soviet Government.

The young man, who came to Russia about a month ago from his 15,000-acre ranch in Colorado, made a lengthy report on cattle-raising conditions as he saw them, with specific recommendations of methods necessary for development of the industry. But he said that the question of whether he would undertake to direct it would not be discussed, if at all, until he returned to the United States.

The administration of the soviet state's large cattle farms was insufficiently trained in modern ranching methods, he said. He indicated that he had recommended the employment of American livestock experts to take charge of the industry, or the training of a number of soviet ranchers in the United States.

LARGE MARKET IS SEEN

"The sooner Soviet Russia builds up itself the better off the rest of the world will be," he said. This country would be a vast market for foreign goods for some time, he added, and the faster it developed the more goods it would need.

Reiterating that his visit was without political significance, he criticized the insistence of many in the United States on withholding long-term credit facilities for soviet purchases and measures against Soviet exports to the United States.

He said he thought American business men were "cutting off their noses to spite their faces" by failing to grasp opportunities for extensive trade with Russia.

"Personally, I should like to see these boys get on their feet," Mr. Lamont added.

In view of the progress the sponsors of the pending bill desire to make, I shall content myself with simply calling attention to the facts which I have mentioned. I shall discuss the matter on a later date.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, has the Senator stated the relationship of the author of the article he read to the Soviet Republic, if any?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean the last article to which I referred, the one by Mr. Lamont, or to the address by Mr. Gill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I refer to the address of Mr. Gill.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that he is in the employ of the Soviet Government with relation to the conduct of the railroad business in Russia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 29) providing for the acceptance of the statute of Charles Brantley Aycock, presented by the State of North Carolina, to be placed in Statuary Hall, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 194) for the relief of Jeff Davis Caperton and Lucy Virginia Caperton, and it was signed by the Vice President.

THE CENTENARY OF AMERICAN RADIOACTIVE SPA, HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I regret that the Philippine matter should have been brought before us this morning. Everybody knows it is controversial, that very much time will be occupied when we come actually to consider in a serious way all the questions involved. Since the Senate has chosen to devote itself until 2 o'clock to a matter that could not possibly be settled in that time, I shall take advantage of the opportunity to make some remarks on another subject.

This week marks the one hundredth anniversary of the acquisition by the United States of the Hot Springs Reservation. There is in progress in Hot Springs, Ark., at this time a centennial celebration. I am glad it is being held, because certainly no act of Congress has been more significant nor more important in many ways than that by which the United States acquired this property. Just 100 years ago the Congress passed an act setting aside 1½ square miles of the public domain surrounding and including the Hot Springs of Arkansas.

I do not blame the Senate, which had its mouth all set to enjoy a discussion of the Philippine-independence question, for being a little impatient because of the intervention of a Member to discuss some extraneous matter. I am not doing this because I am opposed to the Philippine independence bill, which I am, but because there are times when the urge comes to each of us to say something; I have the urge this morning. I wish to speak about the Hot Springs of Arkansas and the radioactive waters which come from them.

When the Government took over the Hot Springs of Arkansas it was the beginning of our national-park policy. That was the first of our national parks, and because this is its centenary, as I have said, commemorative ceremonies are in progress at Hot Springs and will continue throughout the week.

Forty years passed before that initial act was followed by the establishment of a second national park, which was the Yellowstone. At the present moment we have 22 national centers of health and recreation. They comprise 12,531 square miles. In addition, we have 12 national military and other parks under the War Department. There are many lesser reservations classified as national monuments.

The Indians knew of the curative properties of Hot Springs. They believed that the Great Spirit was present in the waters. This tradition attached to the springs long before the time of their discovery in 1541 by De Soto. Hostile tribes are said to have fought for their possession. Finally their value to humanity was recognized by the Indians and by reason of a truce made and an agreement entered into between the various tribes they were finally dedicated to humanity as a whole. Because of that truce the blessings of Hot Springs were made available to the sick of all the Indian nations.

Mr. President, if you ever visited one of the healing springs, particularly one of the hot springs of America, you no doubt have been greatly interested in the evidence of Indian occupation of the grounds about the springs. For example, some years ago I visited the springs at Albany, Ga., some very wonderful springs. In the neighborhood of those springs are scores of mounds made up of chippings from flint implements. It was there that the Indians took their old people. The old men of the tribe, and the old women, too, I suppose, spent their time in making Indian arrowheads, as well as articles for domestic use. The remnants of those operations are still to be found there.

Chief of all these medicinal springs was the Hot Springs. As I have said, the virtues of the waters were recognized and the Indians from all the tribes went there in order that they might have the blessings of the healing waters.

Then the white man moved in. If I am rightly advised, the first white settlement was made in the region of Hot Springs about the year 1800. I have learned from a study of the history of those springs that two white men, Dunbar and Hunter, visited the location in December, 1804. At that time, according to the record which I have before me, they found an open log cabin and a few huts built of split boards. It is supposed that these buildings had been used by white persons who had gone to the springs in the hope of regaining health. So the popularity of the springs was widened and extended until in 1832 the Congress itself determined to take over the property and make it a national park.

Since that time knowledge of the waters and their virtues has increased to the extent that now, I am told, more than 300,000 of the citizens of our country visit the Arkansas Hot Springs every year. The Army and Navy General Hospital is maintained there. This is a famous institution, as every Senator knows. It is an institution dedicated to the treatment of serious and obstinate cases which resist the ordinary means of medical relief. The springs are widely advertised, and the reason for their popularity is because of the fact that the waters are radioactive. That is the case with reference to the waters of all the famous spas of the world.

I have in my hand some advertising from the New York Times of Sunday, January 24, 1932. This is an elaborate piece of advertising. In large type I find "Hot Springs, Ark, radioactive waters, owned and controlled by the United States Government."

Since modern science has traced the curative properties of certain springs to their radioactivity, it was not long before the quacks took advantage of the popular belief in and approval of the public as regards radioactive waters. They foisted upon the public innumerable nostrums in the guise of radioactive cures.

Wherever there is justification for action and authority to act, the Federal Trade Commission has proceeded and is now proceeding against them claims of these and other menaces to the public health. Undoubtedly greater authority is needed by the various governmental agencies which have to do with such matters, the Public Health Service, the Food and Drug Division of the Department of Agriculture, and the Federal Trade Commission. An appeal has been made to me that I might prepare and introduce such bill or bills as would provide for appropriate legislation to guard the public against the claims of radioactive waters or substances which are likely to be harmful. I have under consideration now such measures and am seeking to prepare such legislation as may be needed,

But in the meantime, as I view it, Mr. President, certain clarification of facts seems desirable. I say this because the centennial ceremonies now in progress at Hot Springs, Ark., come on the heels of a distressing incident. Very recently a citizen of the United States, Mr. Eben Byers, met a tragic death, which was attributed to his drinking "radium water." The newspapers were filled with most sensational reports about the death and its alleged cause. These stories have caused misunderstandings and aroused unwarranted fear on the part of many who have been making use of radioactive waters. It seems not inappropriate, in speaking about the centennial at Hot Springs, to say something about this.

The preparation which Mr. Byers used contained, not radon, which is a gaseous emanation of radium, but radium salts in solution. That makes something utterly different in the effects. But the unfortunate circumstance has seriously confused the public regarding the true value and the proper use of all radioactive waters. I want to make clear exactly what I have in mind because I desire to have grow out of my statement something which may be of real value to the American people. To this end I wish to make clear what is found in the natural waters of the Hot Springs and other springs of this country and of the Old World. I want to make clear that their radioactivity is due not to the presence of radium salts in the water, but it is produced by the gaseous emanation of radium known as radon. Because of the confusion of mind on the part of the public, there has been an unfortunate reaction against all radioactive waters. That is a public sentiment which I sincerely regret.

In connection with the warning issued after the Byers poisoning, the opinion of one American authority has received wide publicity. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, of course, to enter upon a medical controversy. On the contrary, it is my desire to urge that there be a scientific determination of the issue.

The question involved in the continued drinking of water made radioactive by radon or radium emanations—and the same question arises whether that radioactivity is induced by a scientific apparatus or as nature provided in the radioactive spring—is: Is it possible that the use of a radioactive water might eventually result in a dangerous accumulation or deposit of radium salts in the system?

The doctor to whom I have referred, who no doubt is sincere in his opinion, is quoted as saying that the benefits of the radioactive spas are due to hygiene and to psychic effect rather than to the radioactivity of the waters. Everyone of us who has visited one of the spas in Europe, at Baden-Baden, Carlsbad, or somewhere else, has been struck by the fact that there are thousands of visitors there "taking the cure." The last time I was at Baden-Baden, two or three years ago, I saw there "taking the cure" more American millionaires than I would be likely to meet in New York City, where I rarely come in contact with one. The authority of whom I have spoken advances the idea that there is nothing in the water, but it is simply the fact that the visitors have the benefit of simplicity of food and the psychological effect of the belief that the springs have virtue. Anyway, millions of Americans have consumed the radioactive waters of these spas in Europe, and also of the Arkansas hot springs and elsewhere in America. If there is sound basis for the opinion that these waters have no value or that their use may result in dangerous deposits of radium salts in the bones, the United States Government should discover it right away. I say this because, as I have indicated, the Government itself is responsible for the popularity of the Hot Springs of Arkansas and the conduct of the Army and the Navy General Hospital there. So if these waters are harmful, it is time we found out about it.

On the other hand, if the radioactive waters of these and similar springs are harmless and beneficent, as the world has believed regarding such springs since the times of the Romans, the mind of the public should be set at ease.

It is a very interesting thing to follow the history of the various spas in Europe. Practically every one of the famous springs in Europe was discovered and made use of by the Romans. During the prosperous days of the Roman Empire wealthy Romans traveled to various springs which they found here and there throughout Europe. We find the remains of the Roman baths; we find the remains of those elaborate marble establishments which were built by the Romans.

I remember one time being at Chester, England. It will be remembered that the name itself, "Chester," comes from a corruption of "castra," meaning "camp," and that Chester was a Roman camp. The very Roman legion, or its predecessor designated by the same Roman numeral, stationed in Rome at the time the Apostle Paul was confined there as a prisoner afterwards went to Britain and camped where modern Chester is located. There are found there the remains of the various baths which were built by the Romans at that time. Wherever they went the Romans carried with them their home customs.

Such springs have had throughout the history of civilization a popularity founded on the belief that the waters themselves contained something which had medicinal virtue and the possibility of the rehabilitation of those who were sick. If I correctly remember my history, Ponce de Leon came over seeking the fountain of eternal youth. I presume he thought he would find a spring somewhere in our country which had marvelous powers, possessing the possibility of physical rejuvenation.

Because of the alarm which has been engendered by the death of this unfortunate man there has arisen a doubt in the minds of the people, not alone as to the value of the waters but as to the possibility that they may actually be harmful. The extent of public alarm and the lack of confidence are indicated in such important publications as the New York Times and the news weekly Time. I have before me clippings from these journals pointing out the possible dangers in the use of radioactive waters. The science editor of the New York Times remarks:

> We shall probably hear less of the virtues of thermal springs.

The news weekly Time states:

> Experts say that, aside from the psychological effect, the only good derived is from the quantities of water imbibed, none from the emanation.

I have just received from the French Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which is incorporated in my State, New York, a letter calling attention to the possible consequences of unjustified public alarm and misunderstanding respecting radioactive spas. Seeking to make available the latest European scientific view of the value of radioactive waters, the French Chamber of Commerce in New York cabled its Paris office on April 19, requesting the office to call upon Professors Rathery and Desgrez, eminent French physicians, to get full replies to certain questions and as to the research made by Dr. Roger Monnery.

I hold in my hand, in the original French, the very interesting monograph by Doctor Monnery on radon, the emanation from radium, and its use in chronic rheumatism. This monograph is dedicated to the great medical authorities whom I have just mentioned—Professor Desgrez, who is professor of medical chemistry of the Faculty of Medicine of Paris, member of the Institute, member of the Academy of Medicine, and incidentally an officer in the Legion of Honor; and Doctor Rathery, professor of experimental medicine of the Faculty of Medicine at Paris; physician to the Hotel Dieu, the municipal hospital; and also an officer of the Legion of Honor. It will be seen that they are very distinguished men. Doctor Monnery dedicates his monograph to these eminent teachers of his.

The French Chamber of Commerce addressed their communication to their Paris correspondent asking that a call be made upon these eminent members of the profession to obtain answers to the questions, as follows:

First, whether the research of Dr. Roger Monnery, based upon clinical observations of the Paris municipal hospital, has been accepted as conclusive by European medical authorities?

Second, what have been the results of any later research?

Third, the present opinion of Professors Rathery and Desgrez as to the value of radioactive waters, and whether, in their opinion, there can be any possibility of radium being deposited in the body as the result of regularly drinking such waters.

I have already told the Senate—and let me repeat before giving the answers—that the men to whom these inquiries were addressed are among the most famous scientists in the world, universally recognized as great scientists. Doctor Desgrez's summary of the research of Doctor Monnery appeared in the bulletin of the French Academy of Medicine a year ago. The Monnery research was conducted under the supervision of Doctor Rathery, who, as I have already told the Senate, is professor of experimental medicine of the Faculty of Medicine and physician at the Paris municipal hospital, where the clinical studies referred to in this monograph were made.

Doctor Desgrez reported to the academy that the hospital patients were given water artificially charged with radon, a radium emanation, and the results were similar to the effects of the cures at the natural hot springs.

The Paris office of the French Chamber of Commerce of the United States replied on April 23. I have here copies of the cablegrams which came in reply to these questions last week. Professors Rathery and Desgrez stated:

First, that the findings of Doctor Monnery have been actually accepted by the medical authorities in Europe; second, that the monograph by Doctor Monnery, a 100-page printed document, which I have before me in the original French, is the latest research document on this subject.

Further, these professors replied that radioactive water—and this is what I want to bring out on the centennial of the Hot Springs—radioactive waters are considered as giving decided therapeutic results, and that it is impossible for radium deposits in the body to result from regularly drinking such waters. They added what all sound medical opinion would confirm, that "like any medicament, such waters should be used in certain doses, and not indiscriminately."

I need not remind you of the good sense of that suggestion. Practically every drug used by the medical profession is a poison if used in large doses. There must be skill and good sense in the application of drugs, I do not care what they are.

Since more of my listeners are lay members of society than Members of the Senate, I can not resist saying that nobody untrained in the use of drugs should make use of them without medical advice. It is a dangerous thing for anybody to have a row of bottles on the shelf in the bathroom, and, if he has the stomachache or the headache or the backache, or some other ache, to make use of these drugs indiscriminately. He ought not to do this without the direction of a physician. Likewise, these radioactive waters should be used as they are used at Hot Springs and at every spa where the waters are radioactive, or where they are alleged to have medicinal properties. They are always used under the direction of a physician. This is true, too, of the prepared waters.

The first thing that happens to you when you go to Mount Clemens in Michigan, or Hot Springs in Arkansas, or Baden-Baden, or Carlsbad, or any other of the spas, is that a physician gives the patient, or the would-be user of waters, a medical examination. He determines just how much of the water may be taken with safety every day.

One of the delightful experiences of visiting a spa is to see the procession of millionaires and multimillionaires and members of the white-collar class, and sometimes of the poverty-stricken class, marching up to the spring every morning to get a liter of some water which, perhaps, is as vile in its taste as if it were brine out of a pork barrel. On the other hand, however, many of the radioactive waters of this country of ours are delightful to the taste as well as capable of bringing healing to the ills of mankind.

In so far as the public can be reassured by research and medical opinion originating at the birthplace of scientific knowledge of radium, this may allay the fears of those who have been taking water made radioactive by radon or radium emanations.

Certainly because of the work in Paris of Madam Curie and of her distinguished husband, if one wished to have information regarding radium and its possible use, Paris is the place to go to get that information.

However, I want it distinctly understood that it does not minimize the danger to have this information if it is proposed to take radium salts in solution. That is where the harm comes. It is not from the use of natural radioactive waters, or water made radioactive by the radium gas, radon.

That is one thing, but actually to take the radium salts into the body is quite another. Certainly it is not enough simply to say, "They are all right." I doubt if they are. We should determine to drive quackery out of business.

To make reassurance doubly sure, I have to-day suggested to the able commissioner of health of the city of New York, Doctor Wynne, the desirability of having some research carried on in this country to parallel the work done by Monnery and others in Europe, and possibly to supplement that of these French experts, this research to be carried out immediately, and the results made public as quickly as may be practicable. I have said, in a letter to Doctor Wynne, which goes off to-day:

Hon. SHIRLEY W. WYNNE,
Commissioner of Health of New York City.

DEAR DOCTOR WYNNE: Permit me to call to your attention the attached copy of a communication I have received from the French Chamber of Commerce of the United States. It relates to current French scientific views on the value and safety of radioactive waters.

Would it not be in the public interest to carry out immediately research parallel, if not supplementary, to that conducted in the Paris municipal hospital?

Monnery's monograph, referred to in the French chamber's communication, is such a remarkable presentation of researches, both clinical and laboratory, that it should attract the attention of scientists everywhere. The author's training in chemistry is unusual, and apparently he speaks with great authority. His views have been confirmed by eminent members of the Faculty of Medicine of Paris. However, it would carry greater weight with the American people if our own research men confirmed these conclusions.

Such distress has been caused by the sensational reports of Byers' tragic death, attributed to "radium water," that many citizens of New York and elsewhere would be reassured by a report of your famous laboratories and hospitals that under proper control radium emanations are harmless. It is a menace to the public welfare to have in our midst so many needlessly frightened persons. If you will permit me to suggest it, I think you can render another important service by acting in the matter.

With kindest regards,

ROYAL S. COPELAND.

It so happens that the New York Board of Health, of which I have some personal knowledge, has attached to it one of the most famous research laboratories in the world, under the direction of Dr. William H. Park, whom I regard as the sanest and the most dependable of all the scientists of the present day. I say that without belittling any other scientist; but if Doctor Park made examination, it would mean much.

It is perfectly astonishing how many persons, including Members of this body, have come to me, since the death of Mr. Byers, in grat distress over the question of whether or not they might with safety continue the use of certain radioactive waters. If that is the attitude of mind of the persons with whom I have talked, I know it must be the attitude of mind of many others in our country. So I am hoping that Doctor Wynne will see fit to have checked up in the laboratories of the city of New York the conclusions reached by Doctor Monnery in his monograph. Then, if an authoritative statement is made, it will allay the fears of thousands of persons who now are needlessly disturbed and distressed over the possibility of harm that may come from radium emanation which they have taken in radioactive waters, or which they may have thought to take in the future.

Nothing short of convincing clinical data, collected under the direction of our own institutions, is likely to remove completely the loss of confidence in all radioactive waters. The alarm caused by the Byers tragedy and its resulting publicity has caused much mental suffering. The facts should be ascertained by American investigators of recognized standing.

I am more and more distressed by the effect of economic stress upon the minds of our people. It is a terrible thing to have the morale of the Nation broken down. I do not care whether you talk to a man who has been rich—because no man knows now whether he is rich or not—to a man who has been a great financier, to a manufacturer, to a clerk, to a carpenter, to a farmer; it makes no difference whom you meet; you find him broken in spirit and distressed over what may happen to our country. There never was a time when peace of mind was so necessary. So when I find now that many persons suffering from rheumatism and arthritis and Heaven knows what are worried and concerned because the favorite radioactive spring water they have been taking has been brought under suspicion by reason of the publicity given to the death of Mr. Byers, it is time that we should do our part to learn the truth and to give publicity to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I have been very much interested in the learned discussion of the Senator from New York. I believe he has performed a timely public service by his address on this subject.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said; and I am sure that my genial friend, always so kind of heart, realizes what it means to have a dear one or a friend or acquaintance with loss of mental poise because of the possibility of poisoning and destruction and perhaps death from the effect of a substance which has been prescribed as a dependable one and a useful one and a necessary one.

We all know that depleted bodies are the inevitable sequel of want and worry. As the world emerges from its present stress, it will face new needs for physical and mental rehabilitation, and more than ever before will consideration of public health be a true index of governmental intelligence.

Have Senators thought of what the poverty of our people will mean to the next generation? If the children of to-day are underfed and undernourished, it means that the adults of the next generation are going to have tuberculosis and other ailments which can be traced to malnutrition. No matter how we may economize in other things, Mr. President, we can not afford to economize in all those matters which have to do with the preservation of the public and individual health. No matter how much we may reduce our appropriations for this, that, and the other thing, we must not reduce our appropriations for all those institutions and departments of government which have to do with the physical welfare of the people. I am sure every Senator here joins me in that thought.

Perhaps no better contribution can be made at this moment than to reassure the public—and that I desire to do—that the claims of the Arkansas hot springs and other spas are well founded, are scientifically founded. For myself, I feel that their reputation is well founded. I am glad they are having the celebration in Hot Springs to-day. I am glad that the Government, in its wisdom, a hundred years ago saw fit to take over this valuable property, valuable because it contributes to the health and the well-being and the longevity of those who make use of those waters.

I can think of no greater service the people of Arkansas can render the public than by drawing attention to the fact that those springs for a hundred years, under the auspices of the Government, have been used for the healing of our people.

I am particularly pleased that this opportunity to speak comes on this particular day. Senators will pardon me for saying that this is the anniversary of the day I entered upon public-health work in the city of New York. I shall never lose my interest in this subject. I can think of nothing more important to the human family than to forward every activity which has to do with the lessening of human pain and suffering and with the prolongation of human life. I think the act of Congress a hundred years ago dedicating this great institution at Hot Springs, the first national park, to this work of healing was a beneficent act on the part of Congress and, in many respects, far more important than thousands of other things which we have done and looked upon at the time as very significant.

I desire to express my congratulations to the people of Arkansas on the century of good works under our Government and on the ages of healing previous to that. I hope this water will continue through many centuries to be a source of healing to the sons of men.

Mr. President, if I have said anything to-day that is at all reassuring to those who have been unduly and unnecessarily alarmed over what may happen to them because they have made regular use of radioactive water, I feel that the hour spent in this discussion, which we had to spend, anyway, is far more important than the consideration of granting sovereignty to a people whom I would be glad to serve by granting them independence if it were not for the conviction I have in my mind that to grant them freedom without the consent of the people of the United States would be an unconstitutional act.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator from New York observed in his last remark leads me to ask this question: If the Congress of the United States in its constitutional processes expresses its consent, is not that the consent of the people of the United States?

Mr. COPELAND. No; it is not. We are the agents of the people of the United States, but we have been given no power of attorney to alienate one foot of the property which is the property of the people of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will yield further, is it the Senator's view that the Philippines are only chattels—so much property, so much soil and wealth? Are not the people to be regarded as people, even though they do live in the Philippines?

Mr. COPELAND. They are a people, a charming people. If it were not for the conviction which I have regarding the constitutional question, I would be delighted to give them their freedom, because my heart throbs with sympathy for any people seeking liberty.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that I am not taking issue with his view, except that I do take issue with his stand that the expression of the Congress under the Constitution with reference to a matter vested in the Congress is not the expression of the people. I have always regarded the voice of the Senator from New York, for instance, as representing the voice of the great people of the State of New York. The doctrine the Senator from New York is now expressing would indicate that the Senator does not voice the sentiments and the welfare of the people of New York. I want to take issue with him on that. I want to take serious issue with the Senator on that.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I represent the people of the sovereign State of New York in all matters having to do with their welfare, but no power has been given me to alienate the sovereignty of the State of New York and to give it over to Canada.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the views the Senator expresses can not be confined to that one matter. He said a while ago that we could not secure the consent of the people of the United States even though Congress, under its constitutional power, should express that consent.

Mr. COPELAND. My friend is a great constitutional lawyer, far more learned in the law certainly than I am, but there are limitations even upon the Senator from Texas. There are times when he would like to do something but he can not because the people have not given him the power to act; and the people did not give the power to the Congress of the United States to alienate sovereignty over 1 square foot of American territory.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON. I want to ask the Senator if he will not permit me to interrupt him to have a message from the House of Representatives acted on. It will take but a minute, and, as I understand, it will be too late after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. This is not a measure for the purpose of alienating any of the territory of the United States, is it?

Mr. MORRISON. No. It is to dedicate a monument in Statuary Hall.

Mr. CONNALLY. Unless it is to alienate territory, the Senator from New York will yield.

(At this point there was laid before the Senate, and agreed to, a concurrent resolution for the acceptance of a statue from the State of North Carolina to be placed in Statuary Hall.)

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New York has just given an eloquent refutation of the very doctrine which he has been professing. He stood here and allowed to be passed through the Senate without objection a measure which, under the Constitution, is the expression of the consent of the people of the United States to have a statue placed in Statuary Hall. Yet a moment ago he said that Congress did not have the constitutional power to give the consent of the people of the United States to the freeing of the Philippines. He believes that we have the power to deal in marble and bronze and treat them as chattels; on the other hand, he wants to treat the Filipinos in the same way as property, chattels, things of tangible character but divested of any human or intellectual qualities or properties. That is the question on which I am taking issue with the Senator. To take the position of the Senator, we have to assume that we acquired the Philippines just as we would go out and buy a horse, or a house, or a tract of land, and, once having it, we can not divest ourselves of it, because he says we can not get the consent of the people of the United States, even though Congress should give that consent. Having acquired it by conquest, or by purchase, we are to forever have it on our shoulders and around us, like the shirt of Nessus, eating our very vitals, as it were, and we can not divest ourselves of this incubus of a dependency and a colonial possession. I am surprised at the Senator from New York enunciating doctrines of that kind.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator has correctly stated my position. When once we acquire a piece of property, when once we add to our territory, it becomes fused with our original possessions, and we have no more right to divest ourselves of sovereignty over it than we would have to divest ourselves of sovereignty over the State of Texas, or over all the lands which came in under the Louisiana Purchase, or any other of our additions to territory.

If there is one question which goes back in my recollection to tender memories, it is this question of the conditions which were brought upon us by the Spanish-American War.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to have the Senator's reaction to this thought, that when we acquired the Philippines, we did not acquire them in fee simple, that we acquired them as trustees for the Filipino people——

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no.

Mr. CONNALLY. And that in the discharge of that trust, whenever it occurs to us that the welfare of the Filipino people requires that we relinquish that trust and vest the title in the cestui que trust instead of the trustee, vest it in those people. Why is not that the broader, the more statesmanlike outlook, upon this question than that we bought the Philippines as we would buy a city lot; that we bought them as we would a farm, as we would a tract of land, to dig an oil well or a copper mine upon it. I resent that sort of idea in dealing with the Philippines. We hold the Philippine Islands as trustees for the benefit of the Filipino people, and when we divest ourselves of that trust and put the Philippines back into the Philippine people we are carrying out that trust.

Mr. COPELAND. The only trouble with my friend from Texas——

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad there is only one.

Mr. COPELAND. Is that in reading the treaty of peace he has mixed up the transfer to us of Cuba with the transfer to us of the Philippines. Apparently he thinks both were the same or else has in his mind conditions of the past relating to the acquisition of Cuba and the acquisition of the Philippines. They are not on all fours.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would not delay for one moment the consideration of the appropriation bill, because that is of significance to the American people, and therefore I yield the floor.

STATUE OF CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK

During the delivery of Mr. COPELAND'S speech,

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution just received from the House of Representatives, and that it be favorably acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 29) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Charles Brantley Aycock, presented by the State of North Carolina to be placed in Statuary Hall, is hereby accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State of North Carolina for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the high purpose of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of the State of North Carolina.

After the conclusion of Mr. COPELAND'S speech,

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

STATE, JUSTICE, JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the Judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is on page 91, line 5, where the committee proposes to strike out "$45,000" and insert "$35,000," so as to read:

Provided, That not more than $35,000 of this amount shall be expended on the coasts of said outlying islands and the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, on several occasions I have invited the attention of the Senate to the desperate condition of agriculture and to the differential which has prevailed against the farmer for the past 10 years, a differential which was tremendously increased last year and is increasing this year. I propose now to invite attention to the obligations which the farmers of the country have outstanding as compared with their ability to pay.

Mr. President, agriculture can not repay its indebtedness unless something is done to bring the farmers a better price for their products. The farm-mortgage debt in the United States now amounts to the staggering total of nearly nine and one-half billion dollars. It has trebled in amount since 1910. Not only has the total amount of indebtedness greatly increased, but the ratio of the indebtedness to the value of farm lands is more than twice as high now as it was in 1910. The total farm-mortgage debt of the United States now represents about 22 per cent of the value of all farms, compared to only 10 per cent in 1910. This includes all farms whether mortgaged or not. The situation is much worse when only the mortgaged farms are considered. In 1928 the ratio of debt to value on owner-operated farms averaged 46 per cent.

A survey of 17,000 representative farms throughout the United States by the United States Department of Agriculture showed that on January 1, 1931, 38 per cent were mortgaged for more than half their value. In addition to mortgage indebtedness, the farmers owe about three and one-half billion dollars in short-term loans and nearly an other billion dollars in mercantile credits.

The debt situation of the farmers has become progressively worse since 1920. As a result of the deflation in 1920 farmers were forced to refund their store accounts and other short-term debts incurred for current expenses, by transferring these short-term debts into mortgage indebtedness. In addition, the continued unprofitable farming operations during subsequent years, entailing heavy losses, required the farmer to cover these losses by piling up a still higher amount of debt in the form of mortgages against his property.

Consequently, when the deflation of 1929 occurred, farmers were in the most unfavorable position to bear it. In many cases their cash reserves were exhausted and their capital investment mortgaged to the limit of its reduced value—not so much from extravagance as from several years of unprofitable operations due to low prices for farm products and high prices for labor, materials, and other factors entering into the cost of production.

The rapid increase in farm-mortgage indebtedness is shown in the following table which I desire to insert in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Farm mortgage debt January 1

[From Farm mortgage Credit, by David L. Wickens, agricultural economist, Division of Agricultural Finance, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, U. S. Department of Agriculture, February, 1932]

United States:
1910	$3,320,470,000

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, while farm debts were mounting upward, farm land values and farm prices declined enormously. Farm land values dropped more than $22,000,000,000 in the period 1920–1931, falling from $66,316,-002,602 in 1920 (census of 1920) to $44,145,210,966 in 1931, or a decline of $22,170,791,636. The index of farm land values in 1931 was 106 per cent of the pre-war level, or only slightly above pre-war values. Farm prices declined from an index level of 205 in 1920 to 60 in February, 1932.

Thus the farm mortgage debt has risen to three times the pre-war level, but farm land values have dropped nearly to the pre-war level and farm prices have dropped until they are only little more than half the pre-war level.

It is apparent that something must be done and be done quickly to restore the level of farm prices to a point where farmers can pay these debts. Thousands of farmers are unable to pay even the interest on their debts, much less the principal, and their homes are being foreclosed. Thousands of farmers are unable to pay their taxes, and their farms are being sold for taxes, but so low has sunk the state of our agriculture that in many cases no one will offer to buy the farms for the amount of the taxes due.

Yet what has this Congress done to remedy this heart-rending situation? Nothing, except to offer to lend the farmer more money to put him deeper in debt. There is not a measure now upon the calendar of the Senate that proposes a constructive remedy for his relief.

Mr. President, measures for loaning money merely postpone for a brief time the evil day. For some it can not even be postponed; they have already lost their farms. Others are so deeply involved that they dare not borrow more. The few who are not in debt naturally hesitate to use borrowed funds when there is little or no prospect of receiving a price high enough for the products produced with this borrowed capital to repay it after paying the necessary costs of production, even if no allowance be made for profit.

What the farmer needs is not more credit but a price for his products that will enable him to pay the debts he already owes.

The only real relief for agriculture and the only real assurance to the creditors of agriculture that the farmers' debts will be paid is to bring about an increase in farm prices as compared to nonfarm prices. The entire population of this country is equally interested in the return of the farmer to economic equality, because the present depression is largely due to the fact that agriculture has not enjoyed just and fair prices for its products.

It is possible, I believe, to bring this kind of relief to our basic farm products, such as wheat, corn, livestock, cotton, tobacco, rice, and other import products. It is possible to make tariffs on farm crops effective, thereby raising farm prices in the domestic markets above the world prices. Such action would give agriculture a tremendous boost toward a level of economic equality with industry. Both political parties have promised the farmer in the past that they would afford constructive legislation, but nothing has been done. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to adjourn without accomplishing anything of a constructive nature for the farmer?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The statement just made by the Senator from Nebraska comes with some surprise to me when I recall that Congress about two years ago appropriated $500,000,000, and put it in the hands of the Federal Farm Board for the purpose of aiding the farmers. Would the Senator object to commenting upon that legislation?

Mr. HOWELL. I have no hesitation about commenting upon that legislation. It was not the form of legislation for which agriculture asked.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely true.

Mr. HOWELL. Agriculture came here with a constructive plan and proposal, but agriculture was not listened to. I voted for the Farm Board bill because it was the only legislation we could get.

Mr. McKELLAR. So did I. If the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that I also voted for the legislation to which the Senator refers, but it will be remembered by us all that, while Congress provided for the equalization fee and the debenture provisions, they were stricken out at the request of the President. The President had his exact way with the farm legislation, and, in my judgment, he emasculated it of all good that might have come to the farmers through it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I believe the farm measure to which the Senator from Tennessee referred has done good in the way of aiding cooperatives, but, so far as establishing equality for the farmer is concerned, it has utterly failed. We enacted that law two years ago; we know it has been a failure; but that does not excuse us for doing nothing now.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that it does not.

Mr. HOWELL. Something must be done now. We have only a little more than a month of this session in which to act. What are we going to do about it? Are we going back and tell the farmer that we did not have the will to act? The situation is serious, and it fundamentally affects the entire Nation, the industrialist as well as the farmer. When it takes two loads of agricultural products to buy industrial products that could have been bought with one load prior to the war, it ought to be realized that this is not merely an agricultural question but it is a question for the whole country to consider. The whole country is affected.

Forty-four per cent of our population are ruralists, and the economic fortunes of those ruralists who are not farmers follow that of the farmer; and with the buying power of 44 per cent of our population cut one-half, what could be expected would be the lot of the rest of the population which is largely dependent upon this outlet for its products?

Mr. President, this is not merely a matter affecting agriculture; it affects every other industry; it is a matter vitally affecting every man, woman, and child in the Nation to-day; and yet Congress is doing nothing. We have been in session for five months, little more than a month of the session remains, and the farmers are asking, "What are you going to do about it?" What is the answer?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator has just stated that Congress is doing nothing about it. I want to remind the Senator that the Committee on Agriculture is now holding hearings; he himself appeared before that committee on yesterday and was given ample time to be heard, and this morning three great farm organizations presented some recommendations to the committee. The hearings are not as yet completed; they will be this afternoon, in all probability, after which the committee, I understand, will probably go into executive session to consider the recommendations made by the farm organizations and by the Senator from Nebraska. So the statement made that "Congress is doing nothing" is hardly accurate. It may do nothing, but an honest effort is now being made to do something.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I realize that the Committee on Agriculture is now considering constructive measures before it, and I want to express my appreciation of the courtesy with which I was received when I appeared before the committee yesterday morning; I have no desire to criticize the committee; but I do want to emphasize, here on the floor of the Senate, that something has got to be done besides considering these measures in committee.

CURTAILMENT OF LARGE INCOMES—OUR BLOATED PLUTOCRACY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, since I undertook to obtain the floor this morning and asked for the consideration of Senate Resolution 204, so much time has elapsed that perhaps I do not recollect what was said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] when I endeavored to secure consideration of that resolution. May I have the statement of the Senator from Arkansas read to me by the reporter, or would that be impracticable at this time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can repeat what I said to the Senator if he desires me to do so.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I said I had no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but that I did not give it my support.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood that to be the statement of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, the position announced by the Senator, who so very ably and conscientiously leads this side of the Chamber, is that he can not support the substance of the Senate resolution which I have submitted. The resolution provides that, exclusive of taxes, no man shall earn an annual income in excess of a million dollars, and that no man shall be permitted to receive by gift by inheritance or other bequest more than $5,000,000 in a lifetime.

THE DISOWNED COALITION

When this matter first came up in connection with the tax bill I asked on the floor of the Senate—and the question was answered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]—had there been a coalition such as had been reported by the press of this city and of the country; had there been a coalition for the purpose of re-forming the tax bill or preventing it from being re-formed in such a way as to dissipate swollen fortunes? The senior Senator from Mississippi spoke at some length to the point that there was no coalition whatever having any such idea in mind.

Prior to that time, Mr. President, I spoke on the floor of the Senate and mentioned the fact that the financial controllers of the oil industry in this country had manipulated taxes in such a way as to put a tariff on everything that was being bought by the farmers and laborers of this country, but that when a tax had been proposed on oil, such as would have interfered with the dominion of the Standard Oil Co. and affiliated trusts, of which Mr. Mellon is such an important part, the senior Senator from Arkansas rose in his seat and called my attention to the fact that there was a proposal to put a tariff on oil of 1 cent a gallon in the bill that was pending in the House. I made the statement then that I feared that nothing was going to come of that proposition.

The bill has come to the Senate; the newspapers have reported a coalition, and that has been denied. I have stated here that this bill was apparently going to be framed in such a way, if the public press knew what it was talking about, as to give no relief whatever to the country. The existence of that kind of a coalition has been disputed, and I think properly disputed; but apparently water has sought and water has found its level; and now we have a meeting of minds. Although perhaps there was no intent to meet, nevertheless there has been such a meeting as to a common course of action in the Senate and in the House of Representatives of the United States. Where is the leadership of the people of the United States of America in the Democratic Party or in the Republican Party of the United States Senate and of the other House of Congress? If we are going to allow this tax bill to be formed and not undertake to sweat down these swollen fortunes in the United States, how are we going to go back to the people who have cried for bread and have been handed a stone of that kind?

THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

I am not very familiar with the rules of our party caucuses, but I understand that the public press has been given information, more or less, as to what has been considered in our Democratic caucuses. If there is any objection or any offense involved, I do not propose to state anything that has not already become public property; but I gained the impression, Mr. President, from the two caucuses of the Democratic Party of the United States Senate which I attended, that there was almost a unanimity of impression that we had to use this tax bill for the purpose of breaking up swollen fortunes in the United States. I heard a splendid presentation of that matter by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I understood that there was more or less unanimity of feeling, without quoting anybody.

Mr. President, I am going to read about three lines from an essay by Lord Bacon. Here is what Lord Bacon said many years ago—and this is the thought of the English-speaking people, the Caucasian race, throughout the world.

I might hesitate to quote Lord Bacon on the floor of the Senate, in view of the disaster which befell him in the latter part of his life, were it not for the fact that when the Supreme Court of the United States in 1910 overturned five of its own decisions in order to write a so-called rule of reason into the antitrust law, it was a decision of Lord Bacon upon which they based their dicta justifying a reversal of five previous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Here is what Lord Bacon said many, many years ago, speaking as President Hoover spoke some days ago, but as he will never speak again until his campaign is over; speaking as the Saturday Evening Post spoke, and as it will never speak again as long as its owner can come here in a $3,000,000 yacht; speaking as men before have spoken. Here is what Lord Bacon said:

> Concerning the materials of sedition, it is a thing well to be considered—for the surest way to prevent seditions (if the times do bear it) is to take away the matter of them; for if there be fuel prepared, it is hard to tell whence the spark shall come that shall set it on fire. The matter of seditions is of two kinds, much poverty and much discontentment. It is certain, so many overthrown estates, so many votes for trouble. * * * This same "multis utile bellum" is an assured and infallible sign of a State disposed to seditions and troubles; and if this poverty and broken estate in the better sort be joined with a want and necessity in the mean people, the danger is imminent and great—for the rebellions of the belly are the worst.
> * * * * * * *
> Above all things, good policy is to be used—

I hope I may have the attention of the Senate in reading the next few lines:

> Above all things, good policy is to be used, that the treasures and monies in a state be not gathered into few hands, for otherwise, a state may have a great stock—> for otherwise, a state may have a great stock, and yet starve; and money is like muck, not good except it be spread. This is done chiefly by suppressing, or, at the least, keeping a strait hand upon the devouring trades of usury * * * and the like.

And we have the great stock—

The United States, Mr. President, if it falls—and God forbid the day when it does—the Government of the United States, if it falls and when it falls, will owe its fall to the Congress of the United States. The United States to-day, with its millions of unemployed and its millions of starving, owes its condition to the Congresses of the United States, past and present, as well as to the fluctuating control of an Executive power that has managed to suppress the desire of Congress if and when the majority of the people of this country, through some sincere expression of popular will, gave this country a Congress upon which they could depend for intelligent action here.

Mr. President, I do not undertake to dispute the Democratic Party's position as enunciated here this morning through our illustrious leader. I do not undertake to question his leadership in the United States Senate on this side of the Chamber. I do not undertake to depreciate the value and the volume that must be attached to the apparent sound of doom from this side of the Chamber for legislation that is going to start this country on the prosperous path of destroying the swollen-fortune system of plutocracy that now has developed a condition where 504 men earn more than 2,300,000 men, and where 485 men earn more than all the people in the United States who are to-day in the clothing industry.

But we can go back and see that Lord Bacon has another authority. I quote another one:

> Woe be to that country that allows house to be joined to house and field to be joined to field until there is no place for habitation in the midst of it.

THE LAND OF PLENTY; LIFE IN THE GRAVE

Here we have a country with plenty. The people of the United States know that they can not get any distribution through the Republican Party. It can not be done. We know as well as we are living that if the Republican Party triumphs this fall it is going to mean the reelection of the present President of the United States. There is no hope for prosperity in this country that can possibly come, regardless of the outcome, through a victory at the polls of the Republican Party this November. All we can do is to get what we have now. Therefore the only thing, the only remedy, the only means of salvation of the people of this country—people who have had to put their own children in the ground to keep them warm, starting their lives in the grave—the only hope for this kind of people has to come through the Democratic Party; and here we have had a Democratic leadership over in the House and a Democratic leadership over in the Senate that imposes sales taxes! There is no such thing as cutting down swollen fortunes. Whatever is proposed that comes from the lords of the realm of Baruch, Rockefeller, and Morgan is going to be sponsored on this side of the Chamber of the United States Senate, as it was sponsored by the leadership of the lower House of Congress.

It is not the will, it is not the wish of the Democratic people of the United States. Although, whenever it comes up to a proposition we are going out here with this Congress standing here and its leaders committing the Democratic Party to principles of the worst kind.

I said we were acting as the outer guard of Wall Street. I once belonged to a lodge. We had an inner guard and an outer guard. The outer guard kept the nondescript from ever knocking on the door. The pronouncement here this morning of our great, illustrious, and patriotic leader on this side of the Chamber [Mr. ROBINSON] is the announcement of the outer guard. We can not get up to the portal and demand admission for the people of the United States who are demanding relief from this condition that prevails to-day.

When it come to a campaign this fall, Mr. President, with a man running on the Farmer-Labor ticket advocating a reduction of these swollen fortunes against a man running on the Democratic ticket advocating ideas sounded by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I am going to vote for the Farmer-Laborite; and when it comes to a campaign this fall with a man running on the Republican ticket advocating a reduction of these swollen fortunes and a distribution of the profits of this land among the people, as God Almighty demanded and ordained, and as against a Democrat sounding the ideas of Baruch, I am going to vote for the Republican if I am there.

I send to the desk, Mr. President, my resignation from every committee in the United States Senate that has been given to me by the Democratic leadership since I have been here. I want to be fair and honorable and right about it. I ask that it be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resignation will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1932.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

I hereby resign as a member of the Committees on Naval Affairs, Manufactures, Commerce, and Interoceanic Canals.

HUEY P. LONG,
United States Senator from Louisiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter of resignation will lie on the table.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, these committee assignments have been very gratuitously given me. I have been a politician all my lifetime; and whenever the time came that anyone who had received anything from my political organization felt that he had to go another way, I expected him to surrender whatever the organization gave him. The Senator from Arkansas does not look on it in that light. I do. I think, in fairness and honor to him, there has got to be another leadership sponsored among the people of the United States for the Democratic Party in Congress.

THE PEOPLE NEED LEADERS, TOO

It may take two years. It may take four. It may take six, and I hope I will be here when the sixth is over; but there has got to be another kind of leadership. We can not sit here in Congress and tell the people that they can swap the devil for the witch. We can not sit here in the United States Senate and tell the people, "You can jump out of the frying pan, but you have got to get in the fire when you do it." We can not sit here—and I hope the distinguished Senators from Texas and from Tennessee and from Oklahoma and from Florida will hear me; we all come from the same section of the country—you can not go back to your people with that kind of political philosophy and come out any better this year than you did four years ago.

The people of this country want relief, and they do not have to eat a whole beef to tell when it is tainted. They have bitten off the hoof of this situation in the United States. They know. We have given them no place to go. We have only a few months in which to do any good.

I hope the prosperous country will be here when four more years shall have rolled around, if we do not win at this time. Certainly we ought to win with a government that the people feel means relief from the recommendations which come from Hoover and from Morgan and from Rockefeller and from Baruch. We ought to win with a government that is not a "heads I win and tails you lose" government.

Mr. President, if to-day I were to walk into the United States Senate or into the House of Representatives, recalling the pronouncement that has been made by the leader on this side of the Chamber and the stand that has been taken by the leaders in the other House of Congress, and if I were blindfolded and were required to pick which side of the Chamber was the Democratic side and which side of the Chamber was the Republican side, and should pass by the desk of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I would certainly have to put my hand on him as representing the Democratic Party here.

I have the highest regard personally for the integrity of the leaders on both sides of this Chamber, and for the leaders on both sides of the House of Representatives. I have no intent to impute to those gentlemen anything but lofty ideals and holy purposes.

NO RELIEF FOR THE MASSES

But I say, Mr. President, that anything that undertakes to get itself through Congress to-day smacking of help to the people has to come through the Democratic Party, and if we adjourn this session of Congress, after disposing of the pending bill, and allow these fortunes which have been amassed at the top to grow bigger and bigger and bigger, then it will not make any difference whether we pass a farm relief bill or not, whether we pass a banking and currency bill or a tax bill or not, if we do not provide a means for distribution of the profits and fruits of this land, if we do not provide for distributing the surpluses which exist, the overproduction of wheat, and of cotton, and of corn, the overproduction of wool, the surplus of houses, when there is nobody to rent them and live in them; if we do not provide a means by which those tangible and intangible properties belonging to the people of this country can be enjoyed and used by the people, Senators need not worry about Congress reassembling; I do not know whether it is going to reassemble or not.

The only way we can go to the people of this country, the only way we can tell them, "Here is a chance, here is relief, here is hope," is to go to them through the leadership of the Democratic Party.

I hope my distinguished colleague the Senator from Arkansas will think a little longer and not irrevocably and irretrievably commit himself to the stand he has taken this morning. His voice could mean so much to the suffering people in his own State and in my State. His position might be the means by which many hungry people could be fed. His position might be the means by which all these surplus goods could be put on the backs of freezing people. His position might be the means by which those without shelter, where the children are put into the ground to keep warm, might start life in a house instead of in a grave.

I am sure, Mr. President, that more mature reflection and consideration of the basic and fundamental facts will appeal to this man with human motives and human emotions, that the light which can not be kept from being seen, and the impoverishment which no one can feel unless he has been in its midst, the hunger which no man can understand until he has been faced with it and known it, that those conditions, which can only be remedied through leadership, will be remedied. I must almost admit that we have reached the time when it is too late to get new leaders in time to do good this year. We have almost reached the point when we have but two or three or four months left. We have not time to train, we have not time for the people to acquire confidence from long years of experience in men as they could have in some of the great leadership the party has had. Therefore, I say that it is almost dependent upon the leadership of this great party, upon these great men, and instead of committing themselves against what could be a distribution and enjoyment of fruits and profits of this land, they should hesitate all the more until they find out some other remedy by which such things could be brought about.

Mr. President, what does my resolution propose? That no man can earn more than a million dollars a year. This "radical" resolution which I introduced would not allow a man to earn more than a million dollars a year. This bolshevistic, socialistic, communistic, radical, revolutionary resolution would not allow a man to have a net earning of more than a million dollars a year.

What else? The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] says that we do not need to pass that resolution; that nobody is going to be able to earn a million dollars a year anyway. Then why should the Senator from Pennsylvania exhibit such opposition to this resolution, if nobody is going to be affected by it? If none of his friends or constituents, or the people of his State, or of the United States, are to be able to make more than a million dollars a year, then what interest or ground can anybody have for assailing a tax designed to prevent an income above a million dollars a year?

WHAT IS ENOUGH?

Is not a million dollars enough? How much more do they want? Are they like the dog described in McGuffey's old second or third reader, that sat back of the hay wagon and would not allow the cow to eat the hay he could not eat himself? Are they to keep the people of the United States from eating the grain and eating the meat and eating the bread they can not eat themselves? Are they going to keep them from wearing the clothes they can not wear, and sleeping in the houses they can not use? What are they going to do with any more than a million dollars a year? What is any man going to do with more than a million dollars a year?

All the palaces a man wants can be maintained in Switzerland or in Rome; works of art and pottery can be bought, lounging rooms can be embellished with all the gold and jewels that can be imported from the Orient; wines can be poured into the golden goblets in every country except the United States under authority of law. Nothing can be denied to a man with an income of a million dollars a year. But if those 540 men who had incomes of $1,185,000,000 had been limited to incomes of $540,000,000, it would have meant to-day something like three-quarters of a billion dollars of money that would have been distributed among the people of this country.

The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] stated—and I have not verified his calculations—that in the year 1931 there was an income in this country of $60,000,000,000, and I suppose those figures were verified from some governmental department. I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he will do me the courtesy, just from where he is sitting, to state whether those figures were verified, and by whom.

Mr. BROOKHART. Those are the figures of the National Industrial Conference Board, which is recognized as one of the best authorities in the country. The income for 1930 was seventy-one billion, and their representative testified before the Banking and Currency Committee that the income for 1931 was sixty billion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as we all know, $60,000,000,000 distributed among the families of this country would have given around $2,500 to a family. Cut it down to $1,500 to the family, and give them the extra thousand, and, figuring on the 120,000,000 people of the United States, there would be prosperity in this land to-day, instead of the disaster and economic distress which we have in its stead.

We have another report, and that is why I offered the second part of the resolution, that no fortune shall be inherited by any man in excess of $5,000,000. This radical, impoverishing, distracting, revolutionary, communistic, bolshevistic product of a disordered mind would limit the amount a man could inherit to the pitiable sum of $5,000,000 per person! Yet the leader of the Democratic Party on this side of the Chamber says that this resolution can not receive any support from him.

Mr. President, how much do we want a man to inherit? How much are we going to allow a man to inherit? Is not $5,000,000 enough for a man to receive when he never worked a day for it in his lifetime? Is not $5,000,000 enough for one man to inherit by the chance of his birth? Has that money inured by any rule of right to a man who accidentally had one parent instead of another, so that he is to be allowed to inherit such a tremendous fortune that there will not be over 40 families in the United States with anything like a comfortable living if that can go on to the limit of time?

It is said that these fortunes were honestly acquired by ingenuity, but the battle is not to the strong, nor the race to the swift, but time and chance do interfere in all matters and in all things, we are told by the Scriptures.

If anybody is being done distressful, unrighteous harm in any respect by having been curbed so that he can inherit only $5,000,000, I fail to see where the argument can stand upon any rule of reason.

Gentlemen of the Senate, I do not object to a man inheriting $5,000,000 just to keep him from having $5,000,000 or more. I do not object to any man earning a million dollars or more just to keep him from having that much money. I only object to it because the Federal Trade Commission in its analysis tells us that 1 per cent of the decedents owned 59 per cent of the wealth of this country. I object to it because each year a smaller percentage of the people own a larger percentage of the wealth.

I object to it because back in 1916, 1 per cent of the people owned about 30 to 35 per cent of the wealth and now 1 per cent of the people own 59 per cent of the wealth.

I object to it because that concentration reached such a point that even a little town like the town in which I was born and raised, Winfield, La., a fine little town in the hills of the State of Louisiana, presented this case: I remember the day, Mr. President, when a grocery store stood on a corner. There were two partners in the business making about $5,000 or $6,000 apiece. They had a bookkeeper and credit man making about $2,500 a year. They had two or three clerks making about $1,800 a year, and they had a delivery man making about $1,000 a year. Those two partners making $5,000 a year bought Packards, bought Cadillacs. The bookkeeper making $2,500 a year bought a Buick. The clerks could buy Dodges. The delivery man could buy a Ford.

But instead of that business being there to-day—and the same condition that prevails in Louisiana prevails in Arkansas and all the other States around it, and all around here, too—instead of that store being there, there is another store on that corner doing three times the business that the other store ever did, and the highest salary of any man in it might be as much as $22 to $24 a week. There is no room and margin left above the bare sinews of existence for the top man to buy, and yet here we have the President of the United States yapping over the country that "prosperity is just around the corner." Here we have our own leadership on the Democratic side—and I will not say anything about the Republican side—advocating the cutting of wages of the only men who are getting anything like a living in the employ of the United States Government to-day.

Why have we not prosperity? It is because we have 120,000,000 of people who have not any money with which to buy anything and have not any way to get any money with which to buy anything. The American has no means whatever. I know that the same fears I have felt have been felt by other Members of this body, those of us who have children we are raising in the world. What business are you going to put your boy into to-morrow when he comes up? Working in a chain store? He can not own that store unless he inherits the store, and he will not own it long unless it is a chain store. He can not go into any legitimate business to-day in this country. I defy any man in the Senate now to tell me a place where a man coming up in the world can go into business to-morrow and make a living out of it. I defy any man on the floor of the Senate to tell where there is going to be a place on earth where any man can go into legitimate business in this country to-morrow. The chains have the drug stores, they have the dry-goods stores, they have all the grocery stores. The chains control the purchase and the sale.

Wealth is concentrated. Income is concentrated, where a mere handful of people are the only ones who receive anything with which to buy. Unless we get down to the basic and fundamental situation, free silver is not going to cure it, inflation of currency is not going to cure it, repealing the eighteenth amendment is not going to cure it, reforming the tariff will not cure it. Unless we get down to the basic and fundamental situation and prescribe and remove that which can only be prescribed and given through the Democratic Party of the United States, unless we get down and give the people of the country the sure and safe and right means by which the earnings, by which the income, by which the fruits of the land can be enjoyed by 120,000,000 people—unless we put some money in the hands of 120,000,000 people to buy—there will be no means and no way by which prosperity can be restored.

Mr. President, sometimes I see how futile it is to undertake anything along this line. How unequal, how feeble, how distressed a man feels who goes back among his friends at home and sees them begging for work, pleading for bread, begging for a place to sleep. How feeble a man feels when he is approached by some friends who tell him that his children in his own house are crying for food to eat and he has not the money to buy it. He comes to the United States Senate, and it is like trying to shoot a bird through a brush heap to find any way under the sun that is hopeful unless and until the Democratic Party that is here in Congress takes this thing by the whip handle, stops these troubadors and crusades and trips to the White House, forgets that it is there, and assure the people that they will have a place to live. Prescribe the bonds; prescribe the limit. What man can exist in the country loaded as it is with all the raw materials it can have? How can you defend the civilization that we have when we have every product under the living creation that man can desire and have and control?

BACK TO GOD'S LAW

Sitting here as the representatives of the great American people, 120,000,000 of them, how can we justify that there is everything in the land that mankind needs and wants and desires? How can we fail to bring about a realization of this perfect dream of America that every man was born equal, endowed with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? How can we go back and say we failed with all our balms, we failed with all our prescriptions? How, then, can we go back and say, if we fail with everything that we failed with, we will not take the law given by God Almighty to man and follow the law that He gives there when He said that no nation could last that did not follow it? If we have tried and failed, if the Republican leadership knows no way to do it, if the Democratic leadership knows no way to do this, then let us be smart enough to say that we will have to depend upon the Lord God Almighty and let the country live. Why can we not?

What was the rule? Chief among all, the one that would take paragraphs and pages to describe in detail, but that the way to do is to redistribute wealth into the hands of the people and keep the incomes in the hands of all the people; and that otherwise no nation could live; and that if we would follow those rules, we would lie down at night in safety and live in a land of plenty and there would be no hunger and no poverty in that land. The only hope the people have of independence is that this great Democratic Party of Jackson, of Jefferson, will find that kind of leadership. It is not going to be bound up with a Gordian knot in the House nor in the Senate, but will be joined by a coalition of the people's representatives in both of these Houses that will strike down these plutocratic fortunes until they reach something like a reasonable level, and we will go back to the people with a platform, with a program, whereby we have said we are going to provide that the enormous fruits of this land will be enjoyed and will be consumed by 120,000,000 people. Are we going to provide work for the idle, food for the hungry, clothes for the naked? Are we going to give shelter to the man who has none? If so, we are going to do it by prescribing that the wealth of the land shall not be concentrated in the hands of a few people to the extent that there is nothing left for the masses of the country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, any man who serves in a position of public responsibility in times like these performs a difficult task. It is not conceivable to me that even the great genius in statesmanship, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], if given a free hand and unlimited control, could quickly solve all the problems which embarrass this Government and its people. I have no doubt there are some who believe there are individuals so wise and so capable that the mere enunciation of their views makes it evil for another to contradict them.

I have no doubt from the address which the Senator from Louisiana has just delivered in the Senate that he has the belief that if he were intrusted with the leadership of the Democrats and with the leadership of the Republicans in this body, that by processes and measures which his great mind conceives and designs to put into effect the very difficult situation in which our people find themselves could be made to disappear and that prosperity would be quickly restored.

But, Mr. President, if the measure which prompted the address of the Senator from Louisiana is to be taken as an illustration or definition of his views of Democratic doctrines, I am perfectly ready to concede that it is time for a new leadership on this side of the Chamber, and I am ready for my colleagues who have so highly honored me in years gone by to exercise their power and express their will just as promptly as possible.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss some of the declarations made by the Senator from Louisiana. I do not intend to assert that the measure which I have in mind, and which my associates generously support, are calculated to constitute a complete cure for all the ills that afflict mortals. There have been times during the last few months when a sense of overwhelming responsibility and of futility of effort have almost crushed my hopes and destroyed my ambition; and I wish now to say to the Senator from Louisiana that when he can convince a majority of the Senators on this side of the Chamber that he or another whom he designates can perform the functions of minority chairman better than its present occupant can, I shall be glad to surrender the measure of authority which I admittedly so ineffectively exercise.

But, Mr. President, Senators, and hearers, it is one thing to give vent to expressions that are calculated to arouse class hatred and class resentment and to point out evils and suffering that we all know exist; it is a very different thing to find adequate and proper remedies.

Reference has been made repeatedly here to an imaginary coalition leadership in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. Mr. President, everyone but the Senator from Louisiana knows that, difficult as conditions are, it is still necessary that this Government function and that a measure of coalition is unavoidable when the House of Representatives is controlled by one political party and the Senate and the Executive are controlled by a different political party.

The measure of coalition that is imperative is that opposition shall not extend to the point that the Government shall be prevented from functioning. If the House of Representatives, if the Democratic leadership in the Senate, should carry their opposition to the point that legislation may not be enacted, that appropriations may not be made, that taxes may not be levied, there would come a breakdown in the Government. It has not been my policy, and it is not my policy now, partisan though I admit myself to be, to carry opposition to such an extreme.

In determining my attitude on public questions my first thought is to consider the principles set forth in the platforms of my party and announced by its leadership in years gone by. Applying that test, the principle asserted by the Senator from Louisiana to-day can find no support in any Democratic platform adopted, since the Constitution came into existence; and he may search the records of public debates throughout the history of the Nation, but he will not find a declaration from the leaders of the Democratic Party in favor of the confiscation of private property by governmental authority in order to limit incomes or fortunes.

The Senator from Louisiana, in characteristic manner, inquires if a million-dollar income is not sufficient. May I ask the Senator, if the principle of confiscation is to be applied to prevent excessive fortunes and incomes, why should $1,000,000 be the limit of income and why should $5,000,000 be the limit of inheritances? Why does not the Senator from Louisiana seek to prescribe a limit that will give comfort or abundance to an individual, and thus taking his property through the process of taxation for the avowed purpose of preventing the accumulation of large estates or the enjoyment of large incomes, apply the remainder of the property so taken to the benefit of those who are less fortunate? What is the theory that makes a million dollars or $5,000,000 sacred? If the power of government is to be used to reduce fortunes, to restrict incomes, to confiscate excessive earnings and excessive accumulations, the millions of deserving citizens of this country for whom the Senator from Louisiana assumes himself to be the sole and authorized spokesman would find difficulty in understanding why the Senator from Louisiana desires to guarantee an annual income of a million dollars and an inheritance of $5,000,000 immune from his scheme of confiscation. Do they not know that many of them live year by year on only a few hundred dollars? Do they not know that a million dollars is more than they could spend?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I take it the Senator thinks that a million dollars would be too much. Am I wrong in that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into a colloquy with the Senator. I am trying to point out—and I think every other Senator sees it—that, if it is within the province of government to limit estates or incomes by the exercise of the power of taxation and by confiscation, consideration might very well be given to making the incomes much less than a million dollars and inheritances much less than $5,000,000.

But, Mr. President, this Government was founded chiefly on two fundamental principles—the right of personal liberty and the right of private property. I know it may be said that those rights are limited by law, but, nevertheless, I assert that no political party in the history of this Nation has ever committed itself to the policy of confiscating incomes or estates. Let it be recognized that inheritance is a privilege, that it can be entirely abolished or forbidden by law; nevertheless, once you assert the principle that it is a proper function of government to take all that one has or may make above a fixed amount, you must necessarily recognize the further principle that the amount may be only such as is needed to meet the requirements of the citizen for comfort and for necessities. This Government should not, even under the conditions that now exist, commit itself to the policy of confiscating private property. There is nothing else in this resolution. The maximum was made high by the Senator in an effort to popularize the principle, which is essentially vicious.

The Senator from Louisiana, in dramatic fashion, tendered his resignation from the committees to which he had been appointed on my motion. That was a comic-opera performance that does not do justice to the dramatic talents and powers of the great actor from Louisiana. [Laughter.] He came to my desk this morning and said, as he said on the floor, "Down in Louisiana when I give a man something, when I appoint him to a place, and he does not go along with me, I expect him to give it back. I make him give it back; and so I would like to tender my resignation from the committees to which you had me appointed."

I said, "That is a foolish suggestion"—those words being the most modest language that could be applied. [Laughter.] The Senator from Louisiana said, "Oh, no; that is my way of doing things. I am going to criticize you for not supporting my resolution; and before I do it, I just want to give you back everything you have given to me."

I said, "Why, go ahead and say anything which your judgment and conscience prompt you to say." Perhaps I ought to have modified that to some extent, and said to the Senator from Louisiana, "if you ever respond to the promptings of judgment." [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has tendered his resignation from his committee assignments as if I had done him some great wrong by saying to the Senate this morning what every other Senator in this Chamber, save alone the Senator from Louisiana, thought—namely, that the resolution should not be supported.

I said to the Senator from Louisiana that I would not object to the consideration of his resolution, but that I would not give it my support. My object in making the latter declaration was to acquaint him with the fact that I did not think the resolution is sound. I should be glad to have the Senate vote on the resolution now. I should like to know how many United States Senators there are who believe that we ought to fix, by law or resolution, the maximum amount which an American citizen may earn or enjoy, taking everything above that amount for the use of some one else. Whenever the Members of the Senate on this side of the Chamber indorse that resolution, they will have another leader. Make certain of that.

Oh, I know it can be said, as it has been said, that one is in sympathy with big business, one is controlled by big business, merely because he does not approve the proposal to "soak the rich" every time some one makes such a proposal. It is not my theory, however, Senators, that government can rest on such principles. It is my theory that by the laws we have given special advantages to groups of our citizens. I believe it can be established that some of the great fortunes of the country have grown up in that way. When we come to exercise the power of taxation, which is the power to destroy, it is my thought that we ought to levy tribute upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay, speaking with respect to incomes; and I think the rates agreed on by the Finance Committee are high rates for peace-time levies. Whenever we take more than half the amount that a man makes, as the rates referred to will do in the higher brackets, we are exercising the power of taxation very freely and very fully.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest resentment at the course taken by the Senator from Louisiana. He seems to have the feeling that he must do something extraordinary, make some unusual display of himself, in order to have that publicity and notoriety which is his due. I have not the slightest objection. He is a handsome and spectacular figure. [Laughter.] His reference to the way things are run in Louisiana discloses the peculiarities of his mental processes. It is my thought that each Senator here should discharge his duties in accordance with what he believes to be sound principles, coordinating his efforts and activities, wherever he can do so without violation of judgment or conscience, with those of his associates, but always reflecting what he regards to be the best interests of the country.

I can not subscribe to the practice of which the Senator from Louisiana boasts. I have felt that his services on these great committees might be of value to the country. I had hoped that he would render those services according to the best of his ability. I am inclined to think now that it might be an exaggeration to express the opinion that I entertained before the speech of the Senator from Louisiana this morning; but, in any event, I believe that the Senator from Louisiana should go ahead and do his duty as he sees it. If he wishes a contest about the leadership on this side of the Chamber, he is welcome to it. I will call a conference for that purpose whenever he desires, or whenever any of my colleagues desire. I have said that the responsibilities are great. Let me say now that they are greater than I care to bear if I do not enjoy the confidence of my associates. What have I to gain by continuing in a leadership that is associated with very great difficulties and very often with futility of effort?

Reference was made by the Senator from Louisiana to visits to the White House. On another occasion he manifested his conception of statesmanship, dignity, and senatorial propriety by referring to visits to the White House on the part of the leaders in this body. Let me say that from the beginning of the history of this country whenever the President of the United States invites anyone to a consultation, courtesy and fairness require that the invitation be responded to, and I regard it as the exemplification of a smallness that can not be described with propriety in this Chamber for a Senator to rise here and criticize his nominal leader for going to the White House when the President sends for him. I still feel that it is not only proper but necessary to accord to the head of this Nation that recognition and courtesy which his position has commanded from the beginning.

Regretting as much as I do that such action is distasteful to anyone, that it displeases my good personal friend but my rival for the honor of a leadership which sometimes very few follow, I must inform him that I shall continue to treat the President of the United States courteously and kindly; and whenever my associates desire a leader who will not do that they will have to obtain the services of some one else—and we all know where he can be found. [Laughter.]

I thank the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I did not intend to criticize the visits of the Senator from Arkansas to the White House, nor did I say anything except what I had in mind, and thought I expressed—that a number of conferences have been recently reported between the Economy Committee of the House of Representatives and the President to form a schedule for scalping the wages of Government employees. I am sure that the language used by me did not import anything at which the Senator could take any offense.

The further remark of the Senator from Arkansas is that I have arranged a comic-opera performance by sending in my resignation; but the distinguished Senator followed that with the statement that if he should now say about me what he thought before I made that speech, it would be an exaggeration. So to be honest and fair with the Senator, knowing that he would feel exactly as he now feels, I gave him the resignation; and I have done it in fairness to the leadership. I think that is only proper.

I do not think the Senator has any complaint about the way things are run in Louisiana. We gave the Senator more votes in Louisiana than he got in Arkansas when he ran for Vice President. [Laughter.] I went to Arkansas to speak for the Senator, and he did not have to come to Louisiana to speak for himself.

The Senator and I are not far apart. If he had kept talking, he would not have been far from the kingdom. He was about to nominate me to be leader. It looked as if the Senator would progress far enough to make it by unanimous consent had he carried this thing a little further.

I have not yet, Mr. President, sought the leadership of the Democratic Party except in the State of Louisiana, because if the Democratic Party is going to continue in the two Houses as it has been going since I have been here, there is no one who ought to want the leadership except the Senator from Arkansas, with the result that is going to happen in November.

It was a very generous act of my distinguished personal friend and political associate from Arkansas to have declined to acquiesce in the suggestion that I resign from the committees. But the Senator almost meets himself coming back, and he is going to get back. It just takes time, like the hands of the clock. I know the distinguished Senator started out right, with the hands both straight up. He has almost reached 6 o'clock, and he is on the way back, because he admits two things: He admits that it is not necessary for any man to earn a million dollars in the United States, or to inherit five million; and then he admits that fixing inheritances is not a matter of confiscation but that inheritances are rights which the law can grant or which the law can withhold. Inheritances are privileges of the law, and if there is no law providing for inheritances, then a man when his father dies would inherit none of his fortune. Likewise the Senator, so distinguished and cultured in the art and science of the law and in public performance as he is, further knows that the right of income and of occupation is statutory, which the Government can grant or which the Government can withhold. Yet the Senator admits on the floor of the Senate that there is no confiscation in it, and no reason why these earnings should be so high.

Mr. President and Members of the Democratic side and of the Republican side of the Senate, I think the Senator will accord me a little bit of learning in the science of political maneuvering in public bodies. I think the Senator will know for one thing that I probably have the discretion not to become a candidate, to take away the leadership which he has carried so honorably, and now so disastrously to the party. I have no idea in that respect except the fond hope that I may bring to his shoulders the weight of his own words, written out on a blackboard, as I will undertake to write them for him when I have time. They give the irresistible coordination of cooperation and approval and acquiescence in everything I have said here from the floor of the Senate to-day.

He says that I have constituted myself the sole and only defender of the people of the United States. He says that the party platform never has advocated anything like what I have advocated here.

Mr. President, there are some things above a party platform that did advocate it. I will read to the Senate about five lines from a platform of all the parties of the United States:

> When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which have impelled them to the separation.
> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal.

Is there equality in America to-day when there are great stores of foodstuffs piled so high they can not be seen because they are almost in the way of the sun? Is there equality to-day when there is more wearing apparel in the United States than four generations of the size of this one could wear out in the next two years, yet people are in need of clothing? When there are all the tenement houses and all the landed estates needed by humanity? Is it equality when half are starving and half of the other half are eking out a mere existence, and only a small part of the other half know anything like reasonable convenience and comfort in the land?

It was the Declaration of Independence of the United States I read. Not only that, I will find for the Senator wherein those principles that the rich should not get richer and the poor should not be poorer have been enunciated by practically every standard bearer the Democratic Party ever had, and by most of the standard bearers the Republican Party ever had, since there have been political campaigns in the United States.

I do not undertake to cast any aspersions upon the motives of the Senator from Arkansas. I do not undertake to say that had he stood in his State as we had him stand in mine he would have been as much beloved there as he was in Louisiana. I do not undertake to say that the party principles which he has enunciated were responsible for Tennessee, Oklahoma, and Texas, immediately adjacent to Arkansas, having voted against the ticket upon which he ran, and the only State adjoining the State of Arkansas that went for him was the State of Louisiana, from which I come.

I do not undertake to say that those things were due to his lack of foresight and sagacity, but I do say that unless we offer to the people of the United States a chance, the only means possible by which they can distribute the wealth and the profits and the incomes of this country to the enjoyment of 120,000,000 people; unless we provide against this terrible concentration of wealth, where 1 per cent of the people own 59 per cent of the wealth; unless we provide against a condition where the Mellon, like other fortunes of that size, is one thirty-second of the total wealth of the entire United States, in one family; unless we provide against the conditions of concentration, then how can we exist as a free and independent country, or, worse still for the Democratic Party, how can we expect the people to accept our leadship in national affairs when we go before them in November?

It is a fact conceded on all hands and corners, and in every crack and crevice, that the Republican Party's administration has been a disaster to this country. But is the Democratic Party to take as its law and inheritance and as part of the responsibility a coworking partnership in this impoverishment and in this poverty and this distress in this day and time? If so, I would urge the Senator from Arkansas not to wait for further invitations from the White House, but to seek them by night and by day, in order that he might carry on his partnership in what is going on in the United States to-day.

I am trying to answer all the things the Senator said. The Senator said one thing not in keeping with the high-minded record and characteristics of the Senator from Arkansas; it is far below the great motives which impel his actions in all matters, public and private; and they are certainly lofty and patriotic in every respect, in line with the distinguished service which he has rendered this country and his State. He said it is far more difficult to prescribe a remedy than it is to arouse class hatred.

Mr. President and Senators, what is the class hatred that has been aroused? I am not appealing for class hatred. If I have ever been a friend of the owners of wealth in this country, I am serving them as the greatest friend I have ever been to them before, and I have not been regarded as other than as a fair and honorable friend of the wealthy interests of any place over which I have had the slightest jurisdiction or where I have participated at all.

My friends, it is a great deal easier to give them the palaces and the comforts, all they can eat and wear and live in, everything they could have for comfort and luxury and convenience; it is a great deal easier to give them all they want, and allow the other twenty, fifty, or one hundred million people to eat, for by this it is a lot easier to guarantee them their continued more prosperity and comfort and life than it is going to be shortly.

Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus divided the world into three parts, and they wound up by pouring molten gold down Crassus's throat so that he could have all he wanted. History can not simply remain stationary and not show some example of what we may expect.

England, Ark., is not the only place that can have a revolution in the United States of America when people become hungry, and there is plenty in the land wherewith they can be fed, and nothing with which to purchase the food.

I am not departing from the standard rules in what I am advocating. I am advocating what the Lord gave to Moses. I am advocating what Christ said on earth, that it was easier for the heavens and earth to fail than it was for one tittle of the law to fail. I am telling to-day what has been told by every prophet in the Bible, what has been told by every religion, whether one is a Buddhist or Confucianist, whether a Christian or what not, I am telling what has been prescribed by the Declaration of Independence, and what has been prescribed by the writers of England, even by the predecessor in the leadership of the Democratic Party in this body of the Senator from Arkansas, Senator Underwood, of Alabama, when I tell you that unless you provide for a sure, ready means of redistribution of the wealth of this country so that income can be enjoyed by the masses, until you put meat in the mouths of the hungry, clothes on the backs of the naked, and a roof above the head of the man without one, when you see them in this country and can put them above them; that no such thing as prosperity will ever come back to America. There is nobody to sell to, and there will be nobody to sell to. So, I say to-day, as I have said, that the leadership of the Democratic Party in the two houses of Congress does not give relief and does not give hope of relief. I say it is because of the fact that the people of the United States who want to support the Democratic Party this coming November, who want relief at the hands of the Democratic Party this coming November, have been left with no place to go to, when the leadership of these two houses advocates precisely and exactly everything that is advocated by the Republican administration of to-day, that this country has been brought to the disaster which it now suffers.

That is why we have to have something done. So far as the Senator continuing as leader in this body is concerned, I am not asking him to call any conference. I am not asking him for any test of strength in the United States Senate. I never ask a man for a test of strength among elected people. I usually ask for tests of strength before the people themselves. Those are the only kind of tests that count for anything with me. When the people want that kind of a test; when the people in this country voting the Democratic ticket can express themselves as to how they feel relative to what is described by the Saturday Evening Post, relative to what is described by the Federal Trade Commission, relative to what is described by the Scriptures, relative to what is described by Bryan and by Jackson and by Jefferson, relative to what is described by Roosevelt, in the words of the immortals, "a bloated plutocracy, 1 per cent of the people lording it over a starveling horde, with a mere margin of well-to-do in between," that is what I have undertaken to say would lead me to go before the people and to ask for a fair test, maybe in Louisiana, maybe in Arkansas, maybe elsewhere.

I hold a little responsibility for the Democratic Party, too. I represent a great State in this body, but of course that does not entitle me to any equality in this body. In addition to having served as governor of my State, I am also, I believe, national Democratic committeeman from my State. As a man having party responsibility, loving his party, and hoping for the party to prevail in the coming November, I am hoping our leadership in the two Houses of Congress will cease to be enamored by the ideas and principles that wrecked the last part of the Wilson administration and wrecked the Hoover administration. Whose ideas were they? Baruch and Hoover! It was the Hoover-Baruch régime that caused the great disaster to the great works that had been done in the six years preceding, and the Hoover-Baruch régime that we have here now.

As I said before on the floor of the Senate, and I say it again, though I may be mistaken in the view—but I am giving my honest impression—I would rather to-day know that Morgan and Rockefeller and Baruch favored this resolution than to know that anybody else in the two Houses of Congress were in favor of it. I would know that that insured the passage of the resolution. I insist that until they have awakened some morning and have been surrounded by a crowd of men they will never understand that there is no living for the top unless there is a living for the bottom; and when they have been divested of all their properties it will be too late to cry out for what I now advocate, for the abyss is yawning for all.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am not fitted by nature or training to engage in rough-and-tumble debate. But when the leadership of my party has been challenged, I think that somebody ought to say just a word of the impression the rest of us have regarding that leadership. I wish one who has been longer in the Senate than I might speak at this moment. But I think some one ought to say a word.

Mr. President, I yield to no man in sympathy for the submerged classes of America. I think no man has a better understanding of those classes than I have. I say that this is no time to create dissension between the millionaires and those who are in poverty, between the rich and the poor.

I say further that in my opinion this is no time for partisanship. The miseries that are upon us are the common miseries. They are common to all parties and to all men. I wish we might go forward in formulating plans for the common good.

I am satisfied that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is doing the very best he can and as much as any man alive could do in his administration of the office of leader on our side. It is a difficult task. It is difficult not only for the Senator from Arkansas, but it is difficult for the leaders on the other side.

Mr. President, these are serious times. I think the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is right when he speaks about the unrest prevailing in the country, but we are not allaying that unrest or that distress by calling attention to these distinctions. They are distinctions that are not so conspicuous to-day as they were two or three years ago.

There are not so many millionaires in this country as there were. I think if the truth were known that most of the men who have been accounted multimillionaires would be found to be just about as well off as the average one of us here.

I wish we might go forward with a firm and steadfast determination in every heart to solve the problems which exist. I believe that is the attitude, in fact I know it is the attitude of our leader. I want to say for myself, representing the largest constituency of any Senator except my colleague in this body, that so far as we are concerned we are content with our leadership and we have that humble sense of obligation that it is upon us to follow our leader in order that we may solve the great problems which distress us. I hesitate to say anything, but I do think that something ought to be said on this side, that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], our leader, should know that there is no lack of confidence on our part. We know he is doing exactly what one of us would do, no matter how one might feel regarding his own qualifications.

We realize, too, that the President of the United States, whom we hope to succeed pretty soon by a Democrat, has great burdens resting upon him. If the President chooses to send for our leader and discuss those problems with him, that certainly is a compliment to our leadership and the feeling the President has that he recognizes his ability and needs our support.

Mr. President, there are times when partisanship is of little avail. I think such a time is upon us now. We are more concerned, I am sure, with the return of our country to economic prosperity than we are as to what man shall be nominated for this office or that or which party may take control. Naturally, as a Democrat, I hope that our party will do so, and I am confident that it will, but nevertheless, when we are facing these problems, when we have the appropriation bills before us, when we have the necessity of passing a tax bill, when we have confronting us the obligation to balance the Budget, this is a time when each of us must submerge his views regarding party or candidate, regarding leader or leadership, and each of us strive as best he can to help to take the country out of the morass into which it has come.

I hope that our leader knows he has back of him a loyal constituency and a loyal following. We know his burdens are great, as burdens are great upon the shoulders of the leaders on the other side. We have just one obligation resting upon us now, and that is to preserve our own United States and bring it into the prosperity which it had a few brief years ago.

STATE, JUSTICE, JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The pending amendment was stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday a question arose as to propaganda relating to reductions in the pending bill. I want to read from section 206 of the act approved June 10, 1921, constituting the Bureau of the Budget:

> SEC. 206. No estimate or request for an appropriation and no request for an increase in an item of any such estimate or request, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met shall be submitted to the Congress or any committee thereof by any officer or employee of any department or establishment unless at the request of either House of Congress.

Mr. President, I also on yesterday referred to a letter which had been sent out by the Department of Commerce. I was mistaken about it being a letter. It was a telegram. It was addressed to a business man in Memphis, my home city, and I read that part of the telegram referring to this matter:

> Present outlook is that Senate will very probably vote on the reduction Monday or Tuesday of next week. It will have a very serious effect on service of bureau, both domestic and abroad. Suggest you communicate your interest to your Senators and Representatives in Congress.
> R. P. LAMONT.

Mr. President, I want to say that under the rule established by the Budget and established by the various committees of the Congress, Cabinet officers are not expected to appear before committees unless invited. The chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], a courteous and splendid gentleman, when these reductions were proposed invited Mr. Lamont to come before the committee. He came and gave his views. But I want to say that, in my judgment, it is in absolute violation of the section of the act which I have just read for Mr. Lamont, after having been invited by the committee, after having presented his views to the committee, to undertake to build a fire back home behind the Senators who are asking reductions, which Mr. Lamont, forsooth, does not approve. For that reason I put this telegram in the RECORD. The telegram was dated April 11, and was addressed to a business man of my city, whose name I do not care to give. That is the telegram and, of course, Mr. Lamont will not deny it.

Mr. President, much was said on yesterday about our destroying this bureau if the 10 per cent reductions were made. Let us examine the history of appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. In 1914 Congress appropriated $174,860 for the entire bureau; in 1915, $446,989.59; in 1916, $419,280. That is for the entire Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. In 1917 Congress appropriated for the entire bureau $507,640; in 1918, $479,120; in 1919, $563,120; in 1920, $910,510, almost doubling the amount in one year. In 1921 the appropriation was $916,539. It was creeping up all the time. But just look at 1922. From 1921 to 1922 the appropriation jumped to $1,228,570; in 1923, $1,598,624. In 1924 it nearly doubled and went to $2,755,557. In 1925 it was $2,713,234. Ah, but we were prosperous then. But let us come to the next year. For 1926 we appropriated for the bureau $3,117,789.25.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FESS. It was in 1925 that the consolidation took place and the Bureau of Mines and the other bureaus were turned over to the Commerce Department.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Tennessee is referring to appropriations not for the entire Department of Commerce but for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of that department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I refer to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which started in 1914 with an appropriation of $174,000 and in 1925 received in appropriations $2,713,234.50. In 1927 its appropriation grew to $3,264,922.17, in 1928 it was $3,711,867, in 1929 it was $4,267,962.90, in 1930 it was $4,718,224.69, in 1931 it was $4,893,421.14, and for the current year, 1932, it is $5,349,891.01. In 18 years the appropriations for this bureau have gone up from $174,000 to $5,349,891.01.

Mr. President, much is said about destroying this bureau; if we cut by a small sum we decrease its appropriations. The President recommended an appropriation of $4,100,000 plus; the committee, under the instruction to cut it 10 per cent, has reduced it to only $3,900,000 plus—a very little difference—and yet speeches are made indicating that we are going to destroy the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce if we reduce the appropriation.

I said yesterday that the opposition to the reduction was due to propaganda, and it is. It begins with the member of the Cabinet in charge of this department and runs through it. Senators ought not to be misled by it. If we are going to turn over to the departments or to Cabinet members the power and duty to legislate for the people of the country, if we are, in the fact of a bankrupt Treasury—for that is what we have—going to continue to appropriate and to borrow money to make the appropriations good—for instance, appropriations for a bureau that 18 years ago spent only $174,000 and is now spending $5,000,000—it will be only a short time until we shall turn the entire Government over to the bureaucrats. We have come very nearly doing it already. They are specious arguments which are made against these cuts, but we ought to make them more than 10 per cent. In my judgment, Mr. President, this Congress, instead of taxing the American people additionally, ought to cut off a billion dollars of these expenses, these wasteful and inconceivably extravagant expenses, and balance the Budget by cutting down expenses rather than by taxing the already overtaxed people in this country.

I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, as I have before stated, I am infinitely more interested in cutting down the expenses of Government than I am in finding new sources of taxation; and I am not at all sure that I am going, by my vote, to put additional taxes on the American people in this hour of their distress and at the same time let these absolutely extravagant expenses be continued.

So, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will permit this bill to pass with these savings made, because we are going to find, when we get to that point, that unless Congress shall make these savings as they have been begun there will not be any made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I hope I shall never be slow to correct any injustice that I think may be done to any officer of the Government, no matter who he may be. It is, perhaps, rather a peculiar rôle for me to stand here in defense of any part of the administration, but as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, let me say that I have found the present head of the Department of Commerce in the United States Government to be a gentleman who is able, courteous, and cooperative, always endeavoring in every fashion that he can to aid, and one who has responded freely and efficiently to every call that has been made upon him.

Mr. President, in rather bitter fashion the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has commented upon telegrams which were sent by Secretary Lamont. Here are the facts, and if these facts constitute a wrong upon his part, I think he and the Senate may make the best of it. Various telegrams were received by the Secretary of Commerce from those who are interested in this particular activity protesting against the cuts which are made in the appropriations for that department. In response to these queries—and only in response to them—he sent a form reply. Telegrams such as the one to which I invite the attention of the Senator from Texas for the instant came to the Department of Commerce and Mr. Lamont. This is from Dallas, Tex.:

Dallas papers carry news item Congress about to abolish appropriation necessary to maintain Dallas office Bureau Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Our observation and work here fully demonstrate to abolish offices anywhere would result loss of millions of dollars annually business interests of country. This is not a theory but is being demonstrated every day through hundreds of merchants, this State being saved from failure result of work of this department. If the town is on fire is it time to abolish the fire department?

H. G. HILD, President.
VERNON HALL,
Secretary-Manager Dallas Wholesale Credit Men's Association.

Telegrams of similar import, wholly unsolicited, came to the Secretary of Commerce from different cities affected by the cuts in the appropriation, and finally, in response—and in response alone to these various telegrams that thus came to him—he sent telegrams in reply. The Senator from Tennessee omitted the first sentence of the telegram which was sent to the gentleman of whom he speaks, living in Memphis, Tenn., I believe, who telegraphed Secretary Lamont. The first sentence of the response of Secretary Lamont reads:

Greatly appreciate your telegram protesting against proposed reductions in funds of foreign and domestic commerce for next year.

And after this acknowledgment the reply proceeds:

Present outlook is that the Senate will very probably vote on the reductions Monday or Tuesday of next week. It would have very serious affect on services of bureau, both domestic and abroad. Suggest you communicate your interest to your Senators and Representatives in Congress.

That is the form telegram which was sent in response to the various telegrams and other communications that came to the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask if this form telegram was sent all over the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was sent simply in reply to those who first telegraphed the department. It was not sent at all generally. It was sent as a response, and the response in each instance was the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator state to how many States the telegrams went?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know.

Mr. McKELLAR. Because unquestionably the Senator strengthens the case when he adds Texas to the list. Maybe there were other States; I imagine there were.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unquestionably there were. But the places affected were few and the responses therefore necessarily so. I know that, unsolicited, to me there came telegrams that were quite numerous from San Francisco and from Los Angeles. I have no doubt that telegrams were sent to citizens in other communities, and I have no doubt that from the communities that were interested—and there were not so many, as the Senator will remember from the list which I read yesterday—that some of those communities that thought they would be affected telegraphed at once to the Secretary of Commerce. And there is his telegram.

Mr. President, if that constitutes treason to the United States or to the Senate or to the Appropriations Committee or to the Senator from Tennessee, I can only say, in the historic words familiar to all, "If that be treason, make the most of it."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, all I can say about it, if the Senator will permit me, is that the Secretary of Commerce is, in my judgment, indirectly violating the law as passed by the Congress. Of course, if a Cabinet officer wishes to do that, it is all right with me, because I am not in a position to prosecute him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I can not think that it is a violation of the law nor an ethical violation in any degree on the part of the Secretary of Commerce.

I merely want to say one word about the figures which have been read as to particular years. Just let me say that the cut reported by the Committee on Appropriations in this particular item was from $4,869,531 to $3,905,000, a cut of $964,531, and not of $200,000, as was stated upon the floor yesterday. There are the facts. We have passed the stage, as I understand the ruling yesterday and the action that was taken by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Washington, where there can be any particular remedy applied. I have only risen, sir, in relation to the Secretary of Commerce and in justice to him and his department to make absolutely plain just what occurred in reference to the telegrams that have been complained of by the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 91, line 10, after the name "United States," to strike out "$273,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to read:

Pacific coast: For surveys and necessary resurveys of coasts on the Pacific Ocean under the jurisdiction of the United States, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 15, after the name "United States," to strike out "$22,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to read:

Tides, currents, etc.: For continuing researches in physical hydrography, relating to harbors and bars, and for tidal and current observations on the coasts of the United States, or other coasts under the jurisdiction of the United States, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 19, after the word "same," to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$5,500," so as to read:

Coast Pilot: For compilation of the Coast Pilot, including the employment of such pilots and nautical experts, and stenographic help in the field and office as may be necessary for the same, $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, line 5, to strike out "$58,000" and insert "$40,000," so as to read:

Magnetic work: For continuing magnetic and seismological observations and to establish meridian lines in connection therewith in all parts of the United States; making magnetic and seismological observations in other regions under the jurisdiction of the United States; purchase of additional magnetic and seismological instruments; lease of sites where necessary and the erection of temporary magnetic and seismological buildings; and including the employment in the field and office of such magnetic and seismological observers and stenographic services as may be necessary, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a few moments ago mentioned the Bureau of Mines, and, as I understood him, attributed part of the appropriation to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] referred to that organization.

May I say that I have here a statement showing the appropriation for the Bureau of Mines for a number of years.

In 1914 it was $664,000.

In 1915 it was $730,606.36.

In 1916 it was $757,307.23.

In 1917 it was $981,138.45.

In 1918 it was $1,466,773.95.

In 1919 it was $3,145,377.28.

My recollection is that the large increase there was brought about in part by reason of some activities during the war.

In 1920 the appropriation for the Bureau of Mines was $1,307,111.53.

In 1921 it was $1,315,963.79.

In 1922 it was $1,534,671.77.

In 1923 it was $1,581,329.52.

In 1924 it was $1,771,167.46.

In 1925 it was $1,900,821.27.

After it became a part of the Department of Commerce the Bureau of Mines continued to receive appropriations as follows:

1926	$2,100,265.57
1927	2,044,409.91
1928	1,946,354.17
1932	2,973,668.29

So that the appropriations for this small organization have increased from $600,000 plus in 1914 to practically $3,000,000 in 1932.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to say that I imagine the Senator from Ohio was misled by an inadvertent error that I made in calling this bureau a department? I ask that that be corrected. I am sure that is what caused the trouble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that correction will be made; and, without objection, the pending amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, yesterday there was some discussion about the rapid increase of the appropriations for the Commerce Department. I recognized that up to a certain time certain bureaus were separate, and later became part of the Commerce Department, and naturally the appropriations for the Commerce Department would be increased when those bureaus became a part of it. To-day, when the Senator from Tennessee was running over this list, and came to 1925, I suggested that it was that year that the Bureau of Mines had been made a part of the Commerce Department.

I recognize, as everybody does, that the Department of Commerce is one of the departments that have had a very rapid growth, and also that the particular activity of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has had a very steady growth. I am of the opinion, however, that it did not grow much more rapidly than the foreign business grew up to 1930. I also think that the Commerce Department has not grown beyond the growth of the business of the country. That is not true, of course, since the depression set in. That is quite obvious.

The only point I was making was that these rapid increases in the Commerce Department can be accounted for by consolidation of bureaus. That is the item I had in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 102, line 20, after the words "dry mounts," to strike out "$279,000" and insert "$275,000," so as to read:

For producing copies of weekly issue of drawings of patents and designs; reproduction of copies of drawings and specifications of exhausted patents, designs, trade-marks, and other papers, such other papers when reproduced for sale to be sold at not less than cost plus 10 per cent; reproduction of foreign patent drawings; photo prints of pending application drawings; and photostat and photographic supplies and dry mounts, $275,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber for a few moments. May I ask the Senator from California if he presented any amendments relating to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I asked yesterday that unanimous consent be accorded, and it was denied; so the amendments have not been presented.

Mr. COPELAND. Does not the Senator intend at some time to present those amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON. We have passed over the items, and they would all have to be reconsidered, one by one, before the amendments could be offered; and that reconsideration would be denied.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to say again, regardless of all that was said in attempted refutation of my statement yesterday, that in my opinion it will be a calamity to our country, at a time when we are seeking economic rehabilitation, to reduce as radically as we have the appropriations for this bureau.

I have just this moment received from the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce a telegram reading as follows:

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 29, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building:

Congratulate you on stand taken reference closing district offices Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, particularly Buffalo. Urge you continue efforts. Our chamber supplies and maintains offices without charge for Buffalo district office, saving bureau thirty-six hundred annually, representing 30 per cent cost maintaining office western New York. Present and potential export business from western New York would be seriously handicapped by closing local office. In world competition for business, Government can obtain and distribute information not obtainable through private channels. When American industry is struggling to maintain pay rolls, closing offices which provide definite contact with world business will give foreign manufacturer great advantage. Please hand copies this telegram Senator WAGNER, Representatives MEAD, COOKE, and ANDREWS.

BUFFALO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. President, that telegram is expressive of the feeling entertained by business men everywhere in America.

Yesterday, using the material which was presented by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I pointed out that the offices of the bureau in Memphis and Knoxville will be closed, and a lot more of these offices will be closed. It may be that they should be closed, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has just said. I do not believe it. I do not think it is good business. I do not think it is common sense.

It is all very well for us to make every possible effort to reduce appropriations. We should make those efforts. There can be no doubt that government has become top-heavy. There can be no doubt that our people are staggering under a burden of debt and of taxation. We must find ways to reduce the cost of government; but when we are making those efforts to reduce the cost of government, we must not invade and destroy activities which mean business to the merchants and manufacturers and farmers of the United States.

These district offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in a sense are the salesmen of American products. There can be no doubt about that. There can be no question of it.

What would you think of a business man, of a wholesaler or of a manufacturer, marketing his own goods, if he proceeded to do away with his salesmen, his traveling men, his advertising men, and all the other agents that have to do with the disposition of his products or of his goods? Senators, we can not do that. It is an outrage to do it.

I can think of activities where we could make greater economies, I believe, than we anticipate doing; but why do we seek to destroy these activities that have to do with the sale of our goods throughout the world, these gathering-places of information for the benefit of our merchants and our manufacturers and our farmers?

You have heard the appeal of the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce. Ordinarily, I do not find any more heart in chambers of commerce than I do in bankers. They are cold-blooded, glass-eyed individuals when they represent these organizations. They may be human beings when they are home and in their clubs and in social contacts, but every one of them is glass-eyed when it comes to any human appeal. When an organization so effective in a business way as the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce makes an appeal such as I have indicated in the telegram which I have read; when the cold-blooded business men who are in the forefront in demanding economy in government, who are criticizing Senators and Representatives because of their failure to cut to the bone, say that we should continue to spend money for activities which have to do with our industrial and agricultural success, there must be a lot of reason why we should. There is not any heart about it with them. There is not any humanity involved in it. There is not anything involved in it except the cold-blooded urge to have business go on.

Mr. President, I share with my friend from California, a sense of hopelessness. I know that the standard has been raised; I know that we must conform to it; but individually I do not intend to conform to that standard without a protest.

I can not see how any Senator here, no matter what he may do as to other items of the bill, can vote to reduce the appropriations for activities which have to do with the very life of our country. May I say to the Senator from California that I suppose that if our tongues were touched with fire from heaven, it would not help any, but we ought to make the Senate understand, if we can, that by cutting off these appropriations and destroying these activities, we are helping to perpetuate and aggravate the economic distress and disease with which we are suffering.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in view of the protests made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from California, what recourse have those who agree, except to vote against the bill as a whole?

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to my friend from Colorado that I would dislike to vote against the bill as a whole. I think we should pass the appropriation bills. We should pass these appropriation bills and the tax bill, and then go home.

Mr. BORAH. I would like to have an executive session first.

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment, and I will give the Senator a chance to ask for an executive session, as far as I am concerned. There must be some parliamentary way by which we can get this matter before this body.

A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. There are those of us on the floor who are anxious to have items on pages 63 and following, to page 70, inclusive, to have certain additions made amounting in all to about $450,000, I think. I ask the Senator from California what the total amount of the proposed changes would be.

Mr. JOHNSON. About $450,000 or $460,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is there a parliamentary way by which this question can be presented to the Senate for a vote, without unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. COPELAND. That would require a two-thirds vote, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I may say to my friend from Colorado that we might just as well go out and bay at the moon. It is hopeless; and because of the fact that we are bound by that parliamentary law we can not do what we ought to do, and I am sorry. I think, when we have a call of the Senate, we ought to ask unanimous consent, and make a further appeal, because it is an outrageous thing and will be reflected in a very marked decrease in the revenues of the American people, if we permit these offices to be wiped out, as is proposed, and as will be done if the measure is left exactly as it is now.

Now I yield so that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] may ask for an executive session.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think that in a moment or two we can get down to the provision for the Bureau of Mines, and I would like to go that far with the bill to-day.

Mr. MOSES. There are a great many individual amendments to be offered, I can assure the Senator from Washington, and the bill can not be completed to-night.

Mr. JONES. I do not think we can finish with the bill to-night, but I would like to get to the item for the Bureau of Mines, which is only a few pages further on, and it would take only a few moments to get to it.

Mr. BORAH. We will see.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 9, to reduce the appropriation for furniture and filing cases for the Patent Office from $27,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 13, after the word "indices," to strike out "$1,110,000" and insert "$1,050,000," and in line 15, after the word "binding," to strike out "$54,000; in all, $1,164,000" and insert "$50,000; in all, $1,100,000," so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of arbitration and conciliation between the United States and Switzerland, signed at Washington on February 16, 1931.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of arbitration and conciliation between the United States and Switzerland, signed at Washington on February 16, 1931.

This treaty embraces without any substantial differences the provisions concerning arbitration and conciliation which, in the relations of the United States with other countries, are contained in separate treaties on each subject.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 2, 1932.

The President of the United States of America and the Swiss Federal Council

Mindful of the obligations, which have been assumed by the United States of America and Switzerland, that the settlement of all disputes of whatever nature or of whatever origin, which may arise between them, shall never be sought except by pacific means; desirous moreover of reaffirming the adherence of the two countries to the principle of submitting to impartial decision all juridical controversies in which they may become involved; and eager to demonstrate the sincerity of the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy in the relations between the United States of America and Switzerland.

Have decided to conclude a treaty of arbitration and conciliation and for that purpose have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

The Swiss Federal Council:

Marc Peter, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Switzerland to the United States of America;

Who, having communicated to one another their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1

Every dispute arising between the Contracting Parties, of whatever nature it may be, shall, when ordinary diplomatic proceedings have failed, be submitted to arbitration or to conciliation, as the Contracting Parties may at the time decide.

ARTICLE 2

Any dispute which has not been settled by diplomacy and in regard to which the Contracting Parties do not in fact have recourse to adjudication by an arbitral tribunal shall be submitted for investigation and report to a Permanent Commission of Conciliation constituted in the manner hereinafter prescribed.

ARTICLE 3

The Permanent Commission of Conciliation shall be composed of five members and shall be constituted as soon as possible after the exchange of ratifications of this Treaty. Each of the Contracting Parties shall appoint two members, one from among its own nationals, the other from among the nationals of a third State. The Contracting Parties will, in common accord, appoint the fifth member, who shall not be one of their nationals, and who shall be ex officio the President of the Commission. If no agreement is reached as to the choice of the President of the Commission his election shall be conducted in accordance with the method prescribed in the fourth, fifth and sixth paragraphs of Article 45 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, concluded at The Hague on October 18, 1907.

At any time when there is no case before the Commission, either of the Contracting Parties may recall a member of the Commission appointed by it and may designate his successor. The recall of the President of the Commission will be effected at any such time on the request of either Contracting Party, provided that if the President shall have been elected in accordance with the method prescribed in the fourth, fifth and sixth paragraphs of Article 45 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, concluded at The Hague on October 18, 1907, no request for his recall may be made within a period of two years from the date of his election. Vacancies, from whatever cause shall be filled as soon as possible in the manner hereinabove provided for the making of original appointments.

Members of the Commission shall receive an adequate honorarium during the time when they are engaged in the performance of duties relating to a case before them. Each of the Contracting Parties will bear its own expenses and one-half of the expenses of the Commission.

ARTICLE 4

After the Contracting Parties shall have agreed to submit a dispute to conciliation, the Commission shall proceed to the consideration of such dispute upon a request sent to its President by either of them.

The Commission shall meet, in the absence of an agreement otherwise, at the place designated by its President.

The Commission may frame its own rules of procedure. In the absence of such rules it shall follow in so far as practicable the procedure set forth in Articles 18 to 34, inclusive, of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes concluded at The Hague, October 18, 1907.

The Commission shall submit its report within one year after the date on which the case shall have been submitted to it, unless the Contracting Parties should, in common accord, shorten or extend the time limit. The report shall be prepared in triplicate, one copy shall be presented to each Government and the third retained by the Commission for its files.

The Contracting Parties agree to furnish the Commission with all the means and facilities required for its investigation and report.

The Contracting Parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the Commission shall have been submitted.

ARTICLE 5

The Contracting Parties bind themselves to submit to arbitration every difference which may have arisen or may arise between them by virtue of a claim of right, which is juridical in its nature, provided that it has not been possible to adjust such difference by diplomacy and it has not in fact been adjusted as a result of reference to the Permanent Commission of Conciliation constituted pursuant to Articles II and III of this Treaty.

ARTICLE 6

The provisions of Article V shall not be invoked in respect of any difference the subject matter of which

(a) is within the domestic jurisdiction of either of the Contracting Parties,

(b) involves the interests of third Parties,

(c) depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States of America concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe Doctrine.

(d) depends upon or involves the observance of the obligations of Switzerland in accordance with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 7

The tribunal to which juridical differences shall be submitted shall be determined in each case by the Contracting Parties but shall, in the absence of other agreement, be the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes concluded October 18, 1907. Decision as to the tribunal shall be made in each case by a special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of the tribunal if necessary, shall define its powers, shall state the question or questions at issue and shall settle the terms of reference.

Such special agreement shall, in each case, be made on the part of the United States of America by the President thereof, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and on the part of Switzerland in accordance with its constitutional law.

ARTICLE 8

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by Switzerland in accordance with its constitutional law.

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall come into force on the day of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated on notice of one year by either Contracting Party to the other.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate in the English and French languages, both texts having equal force, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington the sixteenth day of February in the year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one.

[SEAL.] HENRY L. STIMSON

[SEAL.] MARC PETER

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is an arbitration treaty with Switzerland in the usual, customary form. The two important articles are article 5 and article 6, which I will read. They are as follows:

ARTICLE 5

The contracting parties bind themselves to submit to arbitration every difference which may have arisen or may arise between them by virtue of a claim of right, which is juridical in its nature, provided that it has not been possible to adjust such difference by diplomacy and it has not in fact been adjusted as a result of reference to the Permanent Commission of Conciliation constituted pursuant to articles 2 and 3 of this treaty.

ARTICLE 6

The provisions of article 5 shall not be invoked in respect of any difference the subject matter of which—

(a) Is within the domestic jurisdiction of either of the contracting parties.

(b) Involves the interests of third parties.

(c) Depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States of America concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine.

(d) Depends upon or involves the observance of the obligations of Switzerland in accordance with the covenant of the League of Nations.

There is no other provision in the treaty which I think needs to be called to the attention of the Senate, as the treaty is in the same form as other arbitration treaties.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive B, Seventy-second Congress, first session, an arbitration and conciliation treaty with Switzerland, signed at Washington on February 16, 1931.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

TREATY OF ESTABLISHMENT AND SOJOURN WITH TURKEY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Executive F, a treaty of establishment and sojourn signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and the Republic of Turkey at Ankara on October 28, 1931, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of establishment and sojourn signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and the Republic of Turkey at Ankara on October 28, 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 25, 1932.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of establishment and sojourn between the United States and the Republic of Turkey, signed at Ankara on October 28, 1931.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 24, 1932.

The United States of America and the Republic of Turkey, being desirous of prescribing, in accordance with modern international law, the conditions under which the nationals and corporations of each of the High Contracting Parties may settle and carry on business in the territory of the other Party, and with a view to regulating accordingly questions relating to jurisdiction and fiscal charges, have decided to conclude a treaty for that purpose and have appointed their plenipotentiaries:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

Joseph C. Grew, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Turkish Republic; and

THE PRESIDENT OF THE TURKISH REPUBLIC:

Zekâi Bey, Minister for National Defence who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1.

With reference to the conditions of establishment and sojourn which shall be applicable to the nationals and corporations of either country in the territories of the other, as well as to fiscal charges and judicial competence, the United States of America will accord to Turkey and Turkey will accord to the United States of America the same treatment in all cases as that which is accorded or shall be accorded to the most favored third country.

Nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to affect existing statutes and regulations of either country in relation to the immigration of aliens or the right of either country to enact such statutes.

ARTICLE 2.

The present Treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

It shall take effect at the instant of the exchange of ratifications and shall remain in effect for three years. After this date it shall remain in effect until the expiration of twelve months from the date on which notice of its termination shall have been given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed their seals thereto.

Done in duplicate in the English and Turkish languages at Ankara this 28th day of October nineteen hundred and thirty one.

JOSEPH C. GREW
ZEKÂI

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive F, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a treaty of establishment and sojourn with Turkey, signed at Ankara on October 28, 1931.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Idaho the nature of this treaty with Turkey?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is one paragraph, and that is practically all there is to the treaty. I will read that:

With reference to the conditions of establishment and sojourn which shall be applicable to the nationals and corporations of either country in the territories of the other, as well as to fiscal charges and judicial competence, the United States of America will accord to Turkey and Turkey will accord to the United States of America the same treatment in all cases as that which is accorded or shall be accorded to the most favored third country.

Nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to affect existing statutes and regulations of either country in relation to the immigration of aliens or the right of either country to enact such statutes.

The Senate will see that the only thing the treaty really accomplishes is to give the most-favored-nation principle to both countries.

Mr. KING. The Senator will remember that a number of years ago, after prolonged discussion, the Lausanne treaty, which I thought very unfair and very unjust, was defeated in the Senate. I was wondering whether this proposed treaty, together with one or two others which have been suggested, are not intended to circumvent the action of the Senate and to give validity to a treaty which was defeated after full discussion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator that such a thing is not accomplished, and I do not think there is any such intent. I have talked with Mr. Grew about this matter, and he has said that he had abandoned those controversial matters, and the matters about which we had the extended discussion, and simply contented himself with preserving the most-favored-nation principle and protecting us with reference to immigration. That is all there is in the treaty.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator object to this going over until Monday, or until to-morrow?

Mr. BORAH. I would not object to it going over until to-morrow, but Mr. Grew is very anxious to have it ratified.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will accommodate me so that I can look into it, I will be very much obliged to him.

Mr. BORAH. I will consent to it going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty will be passed over.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

The Senate resumed legislative business.

BOUNDARY LINE OF THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 7119, to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, and for other purposes. It has to do with foreign matters, but about which I think there will be no controversy and no discussion, in all probability. It is a bill for the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, designed to incorporate under the jurisdiction of Panama the territory upon which we are proposing to build an embassy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That with respect to that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation, title to which was acquired by the Government of the United States under the conventions concluded on November 18, 1903, and September 2, 1914, between the United States and Panama, the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to effect with the Republic of Panama a modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so that such line shall then run as follows:

"Beginning at a concrete monument marked 'E,' which is a point on the line on the north boundary of the Paitilla Point Military Reservation as shown on Panama Canal Drawing No. X–6053–1, whose geodetic coordinates are latitude 8° 58′ plus 4,445.6 feet and longitude 79° 31′ plus 923.50 feet, and following along a course of south 33° east for 790 feet to a concrete monument marked 'F'; thence along a course of south 21° 45′ east for a distance of 490 feet to a concrete monument marked 'G'; thence along a course of south 52° west for 870 feet to a concrete monument marked 'H'; thence along a course of south 76° 30′ west for 780 feet more or less to a point marked 'I' on the map, which is an imaginary point located on the center line of the Matasnillo River, which forms the west boundary of the military reservation. All bearings are true. All coordinates are referred to the Panama Colon Datum."

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of State to convey or to surrender to the Government of Panama the title which the Government of the United States now holds in that parcel of land which may be detached from the Panama Canal Zone by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. No civil or criminal case that may be pending in the courts of the Panama Canal Zone at the time this act shall become effective shall be affected thereby, either as to its present status or as to future proceedings, including final judgment or disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. My attention was diverted. What is this bill?

Mr. BORAH. It is a bill which I have asked to have considered, changing the boundary line of the Panama Canal Zone. The purpose is to include within the jurisdiction of the Panama Government a small piece of land which is now owned by the United States, the title to which is to remain in the United States but the control is to be transferred so that we may build thereon an embassy.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator whether there was any difference of opinion in the committee, or whether the report was unanimous?

Mr. BORAH. It was a unanimous report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in connection with the bill the report upon it.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 602, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

MODIFICATION OF PANAMA CANAL ZONE AND THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA BOUNDARY LINE

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 7119):

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7119) to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, reports the same favorably and recommends that it do pass.

The reasons for this bill are fully set forth in a report by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

"The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7119) to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, and for other purposes, having considered same, reports thereon, without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

"The passage of this bill is recommended by the President in his message to Congress on December 10, 1931, as follows:

"To the Congress of the United States:

"I inclose a report by the Secretary of State requesting the submission anew to the present Congress of his recommendation for a modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, so far as it affects that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation.

"I recommend that the Congress enact the necessary legislation authorizing and empowering the Secretary of State to effect the modification of the boundary line as indicated in the attached draft of a proposed bill covering this matter.

"HERBERT HOOVER.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, December 10, 1931."

"The PRESIDENT:

"I have the honor to refer to my report dated December 19, 1930, concerning the modification of the existing boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so far as it affects that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation. This report was transmitted by you to the Congress on December 20, 1930, with the recommendation that the necessary legislation be enacted authorizing and empowering me to effect with the Republic of Panama the modification of the boundary line as indicated. Your recommendation and my report were printed as House Document No. 700, Seventy-first Congress. A copy thereof is attached for convenient information.

"Bills S. 5570 and H. R. 15608, Seventy-first Congress, introduced on January 5, 1931, in the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, were intended to authorize and empower the Secretary of State to effect the proposed modification. The bill H. R. 15608 was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives (H. Rept. 2271, 71st Cong.), and was passed by the House of Representatives on February 21, 1931. It was transmitted to the Senate on February 23, 1931, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"As the Congress adjourned without further action on the bill having been taken, I have the honor to recommend that the matter be submitted anew to the consideration of the Seventy-second Congress.

"For the convenience of the Congress, I attach a draft of a proposed bill covering this matter.

"Respectfully submitted.

"HENRY L. STIMSON.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, November 11, 1931."

"A bill to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, and for other purposes

"Be it enacted, etc., That with respect to that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation, title to which was acquired by the Government of the United States under the conventions concluded on November 18, 1903, and September 2, 1914, between the United States and Panama, the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to effect with the Republic of Panama a modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so that such line shall then run as follows:

S. 33° 00' E. for 790 feet to a concrete monument marked 'F'; thence along a course of S. 21° 45' E. for a distance of 490 feet to a concrete monument marked 'G'; thence along a course of S. 52° 00' W. for 870 feet to a concrete monument marked 'H'; thence along a course of S. 76° 30' W. for 780 feet more or less to a point marked 'I' on the map, which is an imaginary point located on the center line of the Matasnillo River, which forms the west boundary of the military reservation. All bearings are true. All coordinates are referred to the Panama-Colon Datum.

"SEC. 2. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of State to convey or to surrender to the Government of Panama the title which the Government of the United States now holds in that parcel of land which may be detached from the Panama Canal Zone by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of this act.

"SEC. 3. No civil or criminal case that may be pending in the courts of the Panama Canal Zone at the time this act shall become effective shall be affected thereby either as to its present status or as to future proceedings, including final judgment or disposition.

"The purpose of this bill is the modification of the existing boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so far as it affects that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation.

"It has been found advisable to use a portion of this land as the site for the erection of a residence for the American minister to Panama. It is necessary that such a residence be located within the boundaries of the Republic of Panama. By Executive Order No. 3322, dated September 1, 1920, the land in question was placed under the jurisdiction of the War Department. This department stated in a letter dated October 3, 1928, that—

"'Relative to the use by the State Department of a part of Paitilla Point Military Reservation the War Department has no objection to the proposed use by the State Department of the area referred to, nor has it any objection to the recession of that area to the Republic of Panama, provided the three following conditions are fulfilled:

"'1. The private title thereto remains in the Government of the United States.

"'2. The military authorities have free and unrestricted use of all roads in the area in question, either existing or to be constructed, that provide access to and from the Paitilla Point Military Reservation through this area to the main highway in Panaman territory.

"'3. Should the property ceded cease to be used by the State Department it shall be ceded back to the United States and returned to the control of the War Department.'

"If this bill should be enacted by Congress it is proposed to effect the contemplated modification by an exchange of notes which will contain the conditions proposed by the War Department. The suggested change in the existing boundary line, therefore, is for the purpose of effecting a technical transfer of jurisdiction. Land now within the Canal Zone and under the jurisdiction of the United States is by this bill placed within the boundary of the Republic of Panama. Upon the erection of a legation by the United States upon this land the jurisdiction thus secured by Panama is again yielded back to the United States in accordance with the practice of diplomatic immunity and exemption from local jurisdiction."

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would behold the vision of the Most High God. It is only as we rise by faith, by prayer, and by contemplation that evil loses its power. By the majesty of Thy truth, by the attraction of Thy beauty, by the charm of Thy love, and by virtue of the ideals of the Teacher of Nazareth will the embellishments of human life be realized. Deliver us from any false standards and let us see the light in Thy light. Almighty God, breathe into our breasts that power that shall redeem us from any mental confusion. Lift us up into that sphere in which we shall be in unison with Thy purpose. O fill us all with a divine impulse that shall strike any overhanging cloud through and through with light-bearing devotion and sacrifice to our country's needs. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2967. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Randolph, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3270. An act for the relief of Daniel S. Schaffer Co. (Inc.).

THE MISSION OF THE PROGRESSIVES IN THE PRESENT CONGRESS

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert therein a speech made by me over the Columbia network on April 4, 1932.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address over the Columbia Broadcasting System by myself, Monday, April 4, 1932, from Columbia's studios in Washington:

The mission of the progressives in Congress—and I speak for my colleagues in the House of Representatives only—is mainly to keep legislation abreast of the times. We seek to translate into legislation promises and pledges made by both parties in platforms and in campaign speeches before election. I say pledges made by both parties, because on popular issues and necessary economic reforms there is very little difference in these campaign pledges and promises. Often we believe that remedies suggested or reforms proposed do not go far enough, and in these instances we seek to set the pace in an effort to reach the mark and effect the desired result.

Progressives believe that a plank in the platform or a campaign pledge is a solemn promise which must be kept. We are not satisfied to talk about issues. We propose remedies and insist upon their enactment into law. We grow tired of platitudes and demand action. We believe in representative government and insist upon Congress functioning as such and in keeping with original American traditions.

The most useful purpose of the progressives is our fundamental belief that legislation should be considered from a national viewpoint and not in accordance with local or sectional interests. We believe in this country as one nation. We have learned by the sad experience of our respective constituencies, whether in the city or on the farms, whether up North or down South. The lesson of long periods of unemployment, of absolute control of commodity prices has taught us that the people in this country have a common interest. Politicians and exploiters have been able for a long time to flame sectional feeling and to array rural regions against the cities and the workers in the industries against the farmers.

It is our purpose and hope to demolish these artificial barriers. We have learned in discussing our problems that the people of this country have been kept apart by artificially created issues and by local interests while they have been submitted to a systematic exploitation.

The farmer, as well as the skilled and unskilled mechanic, the planters and the wage earners have eventually learned that all the wisdom of financing is not in the possession of the bankers. The people of this country have learned that there is no mystery in a monetary system and that the theoretical gold reserves, while interesting in academic discussions of the classroom, are of no value in the efforts of the unemployed or the underpaid farmer to balance their family budget.

The farmer has learned to view the value of money not in terms of theoretical reserve furnished by high-pressured economists of the banking fraternity, but to weigh his wheat and crops in terms of shoes and clothing, machinery, and the manufactured goods upon which he is dependent. The wage earners of the city now measure their wage in terms of cotton and beefsteak, bread, milk, and rent. They all insist upon a fair and just return for their products and labor.

The time has passed when the producers of this country may be awed into silence by the use of big words or the recital of long columns of figures. They have learned through bitter experience the mathematics of their economics. They demand a square deal, and the progressives will insist that they get it.

The workers and the farmers of this country know that they are not to blame for the present depression. They understand, if big business and the bankers have not yet realized it, that we can not expect to restore prosperity by an increase in our foreign trade. That day is gone, and gone forever, for the reason that other countries are on a production basis themselves in addition to other unsurmountable barriers which need not be discussed at this time. We can only return to prosperity by a complete change of our industrial system along with an economic readjustment.

We can not get out of this depression by proclamations, political speeches, or pep talks. We must so arrange our industries to give immediate employment to all of the willing workers of this country. It means that the working day and the working week must be shortened, thereby giving the benefit of our advanced and efficient methods of quantity production to all the people of the country. Of course this is costly, but nothing can be as costly as unemployment, a destroyed purchasing power, closed factories, and tottering banks and national economic crisis.

Along with this we must provide for a national system of unemployment insurance not only to guarantee economic security to the wage earners and producers of the country but to maintain a certain level of purchasing power, thereby making impossible the recurring cycles of depression under a system which permits of exploitation and overproduction along with unemployment and undernourishment.

The remedy suggested may seem radical and far-fetched to-day, but I venture the prophecy that unless some such constructive change is brought about the remedies we suggest to-day will seem indeed tame and conservative to-morrow.

Much has been said of the activities of the progressives in connection with the consideration of the revenue bill which passed the House last Friday. Indeed, we may well point to this instance in exemplifying the necessity of the exploited and suffering people of this country getting together. In this instance, when bankers and manipulators who were mainly responsible for the present economic crisis were seeking to put upon the backs of the American people the entire cost of paying the deficit which they themselves had created, sectional lines disappeared, partisan affiliations were set aside, and a fine and wholesome coalition was spontaneously formed which succeeded in eliminating the sales tax which had been written into the bill.

It may be well to say in passing that the friends of the sales tax outside of Congress did more than the opponents in Congress to defeat their own measure. The sales tax had no friends in the House. Every Member who took the floor in support of it apologized for so doing. The greed, selfishness, and heartlessness of some of the main sponsors of the sales-tax system were soon brought to light by their gloating over victory which they believed certain. So accustomed were they of controlling revenue bills, they could not imagine a defeat.

Their greed and grasp were such that they could not wait for the proposition to be written into the law, but immediately started a movement, editorialized propaganda, coercion and pressure to bring about the repeal of our income-tax system. They revealed their own insincerity, they exposed their hand, they left no doubt that they were seeking to avoid the payment of their just taxes and passing it on to the great masses of people who were unable to take any additional burden. The vicious attack on the income system, the misrepresentation, the unjustifiable criticism of Congress for standing by this American system of taxation, I will say, and I was in that fight, was one of the main factors which defeated the sales tax.

In order to obtain the passage of the sales tax the slogan of "balancing the Budget" was coined. Yes, we are in favor of balancing the Budget. I have always so stated, but I want to recall to the country last October, when the Treasury Department issued $1,000,000,000 of Government bonds and again in the early part of this year when $900,000,000 of Government bonds were issued, there was no talk of balancing the Budget then. The deficit was just as great. This $1,900,000,000 of long-term bonds was nothing else than making the next generation pay for the current expenses of to-day.

The bankers wanted this additional $1,900,000,000 of Government bonds. As far back as last October I criticized the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, for issuing long-term bonds for current expenditures. The slogan "balancing the Budget" was accompanied by repeated threats of a panic from supposedly responsible citizens. A threat of a panic brought about the declaration of the moratorium on the payment of our foreign debts. A threat of panic brought about the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law when Congress appropriated $2,000,000,000 to aid tottering banks and insolvent railroads.

Last Thursday, when the House had practically finished with the revenue bill, word was sent to Washington from New York City that unless the Treasury Department guaranteed that the Budget would be balanced there was grave danger of a panic. And let it be said to the everlasting credit of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee they added $80,000,000 that night by placing under the normal tax all stock dividends. Personally I believe that it was not necessary to put this additional amount into the bill. But the committee responded to the last demand made, and there certainly can be no complaint, for the quarter who must pay this tax are responsible for its having been written into the bill.

Just one final word to offset the misrepresentation that is being made as to the cause of the present deficit in the Treasury. It is not the fault of extravagance in the necessary expenditures for the maintenance of the American Government. In the first place, the revenues of the Government from income taxes have fallen because the American investor has been swindled out of money by the bankers in whom he had a right to have confidence. Swindled to the tune of over $2,000,000,000 of South American securities alone and several additional hundreds of millions of dollars in European securities. Again, the revenue from income tax has been reduced because American investors were deceived by the bondmongers and the same bankers into buying securities that were artificially inflated.

In some instances the banks artificially inflated their own securities. This breach of confidence—this imposition—resulted in the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars to the investor and millions and millions of dollars to the United States Government in the shape of taxes. Then the forced moratorium resulted in a loss of $252,000,000 during the present fiscal year and about $270,000,000 in all likelihood the next fiscal year.

In addition to that, we have appropriated out of current expenses $500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—to do what? To turn over to the railroads and banks.

In addition to that, we are spending $20,000,000 a year in subsidies to aviation companies, $50,000,000 in subsidies to private shipowners. There again is $70,000,000.

One billion dollars is required to pay the interest and sinking-fund requirements on our national debt. It will readily be seen that in these days of talk of economy that little is being said of the main causes of our depression and Treasury deficit. While small savings may be made here and there, it will amount to very little in comparison with the staggering deficit of the Treasury.

In connection with the sales-tax program there was announced a plan for a general reduction of the salaries of Federal employees and it became known that industry and commerce and business would immediately follow with a like reduction.

It is impossible to understand how anyone could be so short-sighted as not to see the folly of any general wage reduction in this country. Such a plan would only result in further reducing the purchasing power of the American people and prolonging the present depression to a point of complete catastrophe.

The progressives do not intend to stay idle and see the country brought to ruin. We can get out of this depression. We shall get out of it. We will do so by bringing up the purchasing power of the American people and by raising commodity prices; by bringing up the level of the producers instead of a destructive plan of bringing everything down except interest rates and the power of monopolies. Along these lines we have patiently been working for years and we expect to continue. The success and progress of our Republic can not be measured in terms of skyscrapers or reserves in banks. It can not be measured in terms of foreign credits. There is only one way and that is to reestablish a well-balanced prosperity by the distribution of employment in keeping with the machine age in which we are living, creating a high purchasing power able to meet increased commodity prices—and in that way bring about the readjustment essential to our future well-being.

BEER AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include an address recently delivered over the radio by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House to extend my own remarks in the RECORD I include the following address which I recently delivered over radio station WJSV:

In recent years this country has heard much about farm relief. Many plans have been discussed. Much legislation has been enacted. Recently we have heard something about a new plan. We are told that all the farmers' troubles will be over if we legalize beer. In fact, if we are to believe the enthusiastic gentlemen who are now shouting so loudly for beer, it is the magic formula which will solve all our problems, whether they be crime, debts, taxation, unemployment, or farm distress.

I have time this evening to discuss the beer question from one angle alone; that is, as a farm-relief measure. I happen to represent one of the greatest grain-growing districts in the country, and because of the claims which have been made that the legalization of beer would furnish a market for the farmer's grain and start him back on the road to prosperity, I have taken some interest in looking up the facts in that connection.

It is a singular thing that in all the discussion we have had of beer as a farm-relief measure, none of it has come from farmers or those representing farmers. Recently the Committee on Manufactures in the Senate held extensive hearings upon the proposal to legalize beer. The report of these hearings comprises a document of some 574 pages. More than 50 witnesses testified in favor of the measure. A great many of them predicated their advocacy of it on the theory that the manufacture of beer would be of great benefit to agriculture. Yet not one of the witnesses so testifying was a farmer or the representative of a farm organization. Among the witnesses were numerous Members of Congress.

They, too, stated that beer would help the farmer. Yet not one of these Members represented a strictly rural district. On the contrary, on looking over the list we find that they were from Detroit, St. Louis, Buffalo, New York, Chicago, Peoria, and Seattle, to mention only a few. The only representative of a farm organization who appeared was Mr. Louis J. Taber, the head of that great farm organization, the National Grange, who appeared not to support, but to oppose the legalization of beer.

During all the time I have been in Congress I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture. I am acquainted with the legislative representatives of all the farm organizations in the country. They have been assiduously working here in Washington for legislation which their organizations believe will be of benefit to agriculture. Yet I have never heard of any representative of these organizations advocating beer.

It would seem, therefore, that if beer is a solution of our agricultural ills that the farmers and their representatives have singularly overlooked an opportunity. However, after carefully investigating the matter it is not difficult to see why the farmers of this country are not excited about beer as a solution for their troubles.

The theory upon which it is argued that the legalizing of beer would help the farmer is that it would furnish a market for his grain. However, when we come to investigate the amount of grain which was used in the manufacture of beer, and in fact of all alcoholic liquors, in preprohibition days, we find that compared with the total production it was insignificant. During the five years immediately previous to national prohibition we consumed an average of a little less than 100,000,000 bushels of grain, including corn, rye, barley, oats, wheat, and rice, in the production of all distilled and fermented liquors. About 65,000,000 bushels of this was barley, used in making beer. The average annual crop of all the grains just mentioned is approximately 5,000,000,000 bushels, so that it can readily be seen that in preprohibition days we used only 2 per cent of our present grain crop in the manufacture of all alcoholic liquors and only about 1⅓ per cent in the manufacture of beer.

Even assuming that a market for 1⅓ per cent of our grain has been lost because of the prohibition of beer, such an infinitesimal loss is certainly nothing for any farmer to get excited about. As a matter of fact, however, it hasn't been lost.

Most of the propagandists for beer assume that since the coming of prohibition the production of barley has declined. The only thing wrong with this assumption is that it is not true. Mr. August A. Busch, the president of Anheuser-Busch (Inc.), has made the statement that "with the coming of prohibition the barley farmers naturally seeded their lands to wheat and entered into competition with the wheat farmers." Others, following Mr. Busch's lead and, no doubt, without investigating the facts, have made the same statement. The facts, however, are entirely different.

In 1916 the acreage of barley in this country was 7,674,000 and the production was 180,927,000 bushels. In 1917, the year in which more barley was consumed by the beer industry than any other, the acreage was 8,835,000 and the production was 208,975,000 bushels. Contrast these figures with 1929, 1930, and 1931. In 1929 the acreage was 13,068,000 and the yield was 302,892,000 bushels. In 1930 the acreage was 12,437,000 and the yield was 325,893,000. In 1931 the Northwest States, where the greater part of our barley is produced, suffered a very severe drought, which interfered somewhat with the seeding of barley. Nevertheless, in that year, the acreage planted was 11,471,000 and the total yield, in spite of the drought, was 198,965,000 bushels. It can be seen, therefore, that instead of there being a decrease in the production and consumption of barley, there has actually been a very marked increase. It is hard to see how the barley farmer has been injured by prohibition.

Furthermore, the figures reveal that instead of the barley farmers shifting to the production of wheat, thus increasing the wheat surplus, the shift has been the other way. The great increase in barley has been in the Northwest, in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, and North and South Dakota, and, generally speaking, this region has reduced its wheat acreage since the war period. The great increase in wheat acreage has been in the hard winter-wheat region of the Southwest, and it has not displaced barley, which has never been grown to any extent in that section.

Now, it may be asked what is being done with all this barley? Well, the figures show it is being used as feed for livestock, particularly for dairy cattle and hogs. The States in the Northwest, where the great increase in barley production has taken place, are the premier dairy States of the Union. They have also greatly increased their production of pork. Now, some one may say, What has that to do with beer? Simply this: That instead of converting our barley into beer, we are converting it into milk and pork chops. Figures compiled by the Department of Agriculture show that in 1917 the average per capita consumption of milk and milk products, computed in terms of milk, in this country was 754.8 pounds, while in 1929, the last normal year, it was 997.5 pounds. I do not have the figures for 1931, but for 1930 the consumption of milk and milk products was almost exactly the same as for 1929, only a fraction of 1 per cent less. Now, this great increase in the per capita consumption of milk means the consumption not only of more grain than was used in the manufacture of all distilled and fermented liquors in 1917 but means the consumption of a great additional quantity of hay and other roughage grown by the farmers of this country. This was very clearly pointed out by Mr. Taber in his statement before the Senate committee, in which he showed that in order to produce this increased consumption of milk we consume a total of over 10,000,000,000 pounds of grain and 25,000,000,000 pounds of roughage, whereas all grain used in distilled and fermented liquors in 1917 was but 6,200,000,000 pounds. Furthermore, when a farmer converts his barley into milk or pork, he gets some of the manufacturing profits, whereas if it goes into beer, the brewer and the saloon get all the profit.

If time permitted one might go on and enumerate other economic benefits which have come to the farmer as a result of prohibition. I might call attention to the matter of the corn-sugar manufacturing industry, which has developed so greatly in recent years. Corn sugar is used quite largely in the manufacture of confectionery, soft drinks, and like products, the production of which has greatly expanded during the prohibition era. The return of beer would certainly not increase the consumption of these products.

In 1917 we produced a little over 60,000,000 barrels of beer. I don't know much about the price of beer, but in the discussions in Congress it has been suggested that if beer were legalized it would sell for 15 cents per pint. Sixty million barrels at 15 cents per pint would be $2,232,000,000. Can you imagine that the expenditure of over $2,000,000,000 for beer would help the market for farm products? This is a day of intense competition for the consumer's dollar and past experience has demonstrated that in competing for the dollar no product has a chance with liquor. It gets the first call every time. The farmer knows that the dollar which is spent for beer can not be spent for milk, cheese, pork, or any other product of the farm. Therefore, it is not hard to understand why he is not throwing his hat in the air over the idea of legalizing beer. He knows that a return of beer, while it may afford a market for an insignificant amount of his grain, means losing a much larger market for products which are infinitely more profitable to him.

The farmer's opposition to beer is not alone on economic grounds. He is against it generally speaking on moral and social grounds. Irrespective of these reasons, every thinking farmer can justify his opposition to beer solely on the basis of economics. I am not afraid, therefore, that any of the farmer's would-be friends from the metropolitan centers of this country are going to convince him that beer and farm relief have any connection.

POINT OF NO QUORUM

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11267, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night Title III had been read and is now subject to amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CANNON: Strike out section 303.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, of necessity this bill has been very hastily compiled. Into it has been thrown hodgepodge many diverse propositions relating to numerous governmental activities. It follows, necessarily, that some have been included without adequate consideration. That is particularly true of the proposition to dispense with aid to vocational education. It is difficult to believe that the committee gave the subject more than cursory attention, for this provision is a blow not only at education but at labor and agriculture. At a time when we need—as we never have needed before—and as, I trust, we never will need again—skilled hands and trained minds in the ranks of organized labor; at a time when we need constructive management and trained leadership in every department of agriculture, this bill proposes to discontinue Federal aid and encouragement in the education of the young men and the young women who in a few short years must take over the burdens and responsibilities of solving the vocational problems of both agriculture and labor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, strikes out of this bill that section which in effect repeals during the next 10 years Federal aid for vocational education, and would permit the Federal Government to continue to give the aid that is now being given?

Mr. CANNON. That is true. The effect of the amendment is to continue, unimpaired, the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States in the maintenance of the vocational courses in the public schools, every year turning out future citizens specially trained to meet the practical problems of life.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that ought to be done.

Mr. CANNON. Beyond question. It is a particularly appealing form of education. It involves not only mental training but correlated manual training as well. It is a form of education most needed to-day. It is a direct and practical preparation for life. It is a direct and practical preparation for service. It transforms the street loafer into a skilled artisan. It transforms the irresponsible girl into an efficient home maker. It is a guaranty of the adequacy of the American home and is the ideal preparation for American citizenship.

This provision to eliminate it would deny that training to 92 per cent of the young men and young women of the country, for only 8 per cent come from families which are able at this time to give their children the advantages of the professional colleges, the trade schools, or the technical institutes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman think this training would be possible to these students unless this aid is afforded?

Mr. CANNON. We have information, carefully compiled, that the withdrawal of Federal aid means the discontinuance of 90 per cent of these vocational courses in the schools of my own State, and that is to some extent indicative of the situation in the schools of every State of the Union. To deny this training is to condemn 92 per cent of our young men and young women to a scale of income commensurate only with their mere physical capacities. It chains them to a treadmill of existence in which there can be no hope of progress or advancement. It tends to a condition typified by the Man with the Hoe. It shuts out from their lives—

The upward looking and the light.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I yield to my friend the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it not also a repudiation of an obligation entered into by Uncle Sam with the States and the States through contracts with teachers in the schools, ramifying in all States of the Union?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman states the situation accurately. It is a repudiation of a contract which was entered into at the suggestion of the Federal Government itself. Cooperation in education was not initiated at the request of the States, but at the sole instance of the Federal Government. In conformity with the implied agreement thus entered into, the States have invested large sums in equipment which can not be used for any other purpose, and have permanently reorganized their schools and their courses of instruction. For the Federal Government to now withdraw from this partnership with the States is little short of a breach of contract and smacks of bad faith.

And it will not save a dollar. This bill is proposed as an economy measure. It is intended to tide over the situation for the coming fiscal year. It is announced as purely temporary. And yet here is a proposition which during the coming fiscal year of 1933 will not reduce Government expenditures a single penny. This is not an economy measure. It is not an emergency measure. It is not a retrenchment. Then why is it included in this bill? The answer is obvious. There is a school of thought in this country that is opposed to the education of the people at the expense of the Federal Government. It means nothing to them that such a policy produces an unintelligent electorate; that it tends to reduce men to the status of beasts of burden in the fields and unthinking human machines in the shops and factories. They are concerned only with lower corporation taxes and larger dividends.

But they defeat their own purpose. Experience has demonstrated that their profits are dependent on the skill and intelligence of their workmen. America is recognized as the foremost agricultural and industrial nation of the world. She has the most productive farms, the most efficient manufactories, and the output of her fields and factories is higher per unit than that of any other country on the globe. Why is Russia's agricultural and industrial program failing? It is because they lack competent man power. Why are other European nations unable to cope with us in the production of commodities? It is because our farmers and artisans have been trained in better schools and therefore have a higher mental capacity and adaptability. That is the secret of American supremacy in the markets of the world. America leads because America educates. And when America ceases to educate, America will cease to lead. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri that this provision will destroy vocational education in 90 per cent of the schools of this country certainly must be the result of a lack of understanding of this problem on his part. In the first place, the committee does not interfere with these funds for the year 1933.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. For a brief question.

Mr. BULWINKLE. We are acting under an economy bill, are we not?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. This provision does not touch the appropriation for this year, does it?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not at all.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then what is the use of reaching out for 10 years?

Mr. McDUFFIE. You can practice economy in other years as well as in this year. This curtailment does not interfere at all with the rehabilitation of those injured in industry. Whenever a man is crippled and must be trained, it does not touch that fund at all. The idea of the committee was—and we gave it careful study—that in the Department of Agriculture you have the Bureau of Home Economics; you have your agricultural extension work and you have your county agents going into the home and into the field teaching the very things that are being taught under the appropriations carried by this bill. There has been an urge from the beginning to get the Federal Government further and further into the business, if you please, of educating the youth of this land. We thought the time has come for the taxpayers themselves to stop and think—even though the Federal Government puts up a small part of this money, the States putting up about $3 to $1—whether or not it was a proper function of the Federal Government to educate the children in the various States. You are doing this work through your Agricultural Department in so far as agriculture is concerned. We already have an overproduction of agricultural products. Evidently we have been educated to that point where we are producing more than we can consume or sell; yet we are providing high-priced officials in Washington and furnishing money for teaching those things we should have learned by this time.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. Is it not true that practically every large school district throughout the country districts of the United States has erected buildings to carry out the agreement they made with the Government?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not as to this money.

Mr. GLOVER. That is true in my district.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Oh, no. This is the way this money is expended: The States make up their budgets and the local communities raise so much money; they add it to the funds of the States, and then they come to Washington and say, "We have complied with your rules; therefore we ask you to reimburse us about $1 for the $3 or $4 we are putting up for this fund."

It is folly to say that education will be stopped in this country if this fund is discontinued, especially since we are not discontinuing the funds all at once.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Under the original act does the State obligate itself in advance, and is a State required to accept this from the Government or can a State reject it if it wants to do so?

Mr. McDUFFIE. A State can reject it if it wants to do so, but when did the gentleman ever know a State to reject anything coming from the Federal Treasury? The States are always ready and willing to accept such aid, and the result of that policy is that communities have incurred bonded indebtedness—and so have States throughout this country—to such an extent that they can not pay it for many years to come. Of course, there are some things in which the Federal Government had to become a pioneer. It is hard to draw the line, but if we continue all the Federal activities and increase them, as the tendency now is, it is only a question of time before the jurisdiction and authority of the States will be merged into the Central Government.

By a gradual reduction of 10 per cent a year for 10 years this bill gets the Government out of the vocational education business, and after much study the committee felt that the Government could well afford to let this responsibility fall where it originally belonged and where it belongs to-day, and that is upon the localities or States affected.

The activities of certain educational organizations now are toward the establishment of a new executive department for education, which will ultimately mean that our common schools will be operated under rules and regulations of some bureau in Washington. Personally I prefer the children of my State educated under regulations of my State rather than under any rules emanating from Washington. I wish to quote the following on very good authority inserted in the committee report:

SEC. 303. Under the bill, the permanent annual appropriations for vocational education (see U. S. C., title 20, secs. 11–28), now amounting to $7,167,000, are reduced in the sum of 10 per cent of that amount, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, and in a like sum for each succeeding year, so that, after the fiscal year 1942, these appropriations will have been abolished. The permanent annual appropriation of $200,000 for administration of the vocational education act is abolished, and, in lieu thereof, authority is provided for an annual appropriation of $200,000 for the purpose.

The authority for the existing annual appropriation of $1,500,000, to supplement the permanent appropriation, is continued for the fiscal year 1934 in the sum of $1,500,000, at which time the law authorizing it expires by its own terms (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 20, secs. 15a–15c). The amount authorized for 1932 is $1,500,000, for 1933 it is $2,000,000, and for 1934, $2,500,000. The Budget estimate for 1933 was for $1,500,000, retaining the level of 1932, and the present bill continues it for 1934 at the same level.

The extent to which Federal legislation has tended to remove final control of education from the States to the Federal Government may be indicated by citing the last important act establishing a new and extensive program of Federal participation, the Smith-Hughes Act of 1917.

This act requires the final approval of the Federal Board for Vocational Education for every State plan adopted. The plan must be initiated by a State, but it can be rejected by the Federal agencies. The act requires that moneys offered by the Federal Government shall be matched by the State or local governments or both. But Federal moneys are not advanced. The State and the community anticipate the grant, spend their own money, and are reimbursed for the moneys advanced, provided the Federal authority believes standards are met. Minimum standards determining hours and minutes of instruction are set up in the Federal acts and must be accepted by both State and Federal agencies.

Recognizing fully that constructive advances in the theory and practice of vocational education have been made because of the activities initiated by this act, it is, nevertheless, a fair question whether these benefits compensate for the inevitable weakening of local responsibility and autonomy that follows continuous applications of the prescriptions of the act.

The existing status of the permanent annual appropriations for vocational education is as follows:

The vocational education act of February 23, 1917 (U. S. C., title 20, secs. 11–28), provides permanent annual appropriations for vocational education in cooperation with the States, as follows:

Agricultural training: For training in agricultural subjects, $3,000,000, to be allotted among the several States on the proportional basis of their rural population, no State to receive less than $10,000 for any fiscal year, a further permanent annual appropriation of $27,000 being provided to care for the minimum allotments.

Training in trade, industrial, and home-economics subjects: For such training there is provided a permanent annual appropriation of $3,000,000, to be allotted among the several States on the proportional basis of their urban population, no State to receive less than $10,000 for any fiscal year, a further permanent annual appropriation of $50,000 being provided to care for the minimum allotments.

Teacher training: For the training of teachers in the foregoing subjects there is provided a permanent annual appropriation of $1,000,000, to be allotted among the several States on the proportional basis of their total population, no State to receive less than $10,000 for any fiscal year, a further permanent annual appropriation of $90,000 being provided to care for the minimum allotments.

Administration: A permanent annual appropriation of $200,000 is provided for expenditure by the Federal Board for Vocational Education for making studies and investigations, and reporting thereon, concerning suitable courses of study and training in the foregoing subjects, and for other administrative purposes.

Total: The total amount of the foregoing permanent annual appropriations for cooperation with the States in vocational education, including the $200,000 for administrative purposes, is $7,367,000.

State cooperation: The act provides that for each dollar expended by the Federal Government, aside from administration, for vocational training the State or local community shall expend an equal amount for the purpose. Under this provision the States and localities are now expending approximately $3 for every dollar expended by the Federal Government, savings approximately a million per year for 10 years.

The following table sets out, year by year, the diminishing permanent annual appropriations as they are provided for by the terms of the accompanying bill:

Year	Agricultural training	Industrial training	Teacher training	Minimum allotments	Administration	Total
1933	$3,000,000	$3,000,000	$1,000,000	$167,000	$200,000	$7,367,000
1934	2,700,000	2,700,000	900,000	150,300	(1)	[2] 6,450,000
1935	2,400,000	2,400,000	800,000	133,600	(1)	[2] 5,733,300
1936	2,100,000	2,100,000	700,000	116,900	(1)	[2] 5,016,600
1937	1,800,000	1,800,000	600,000	100,200	(1)	[2] 4,299,900
1938	1,500,000	1,500,000	500,000	83,500	(1)	[2] 3,583,200
1939	1,200,000	1,200,000	400,000	66,800	(1)	[2] 2,866,500
1940	900,000	900,000	300,000	50,100	(1)	[2] 2,149,800
1941	600,000	600,000	200,000	33,400	(1)	[2] 1,433,100
1942	300,000	300,000	100,000	16,700	(1)	[2] 716,700

[1] The permanent appropriation of $200,000 per annum for administration is abolished entirely, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, and there is substituted for it an authorization of an annual appropriation of not to exceed $200,000.

[2] Together with such annual appropriation for administration as may be made by Congress.

With respect to this section we call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that within the Department of Agriculture, which is quite independent from the Board for Vocational Education and not affected by the provisions of this section, there are several agencies, viz, the Extension Service, which includes education in agriculture; administration of economics of the home; Bureau of Agricultural Engineering; and a Bureau of Home Economics, all of which perform services not exactly identical but very similar to those performed by the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the difference between the two being largely that in the case of vocational education instruction is carried on in the schools, while in the case of agencies within the Department of Agriculture the education is carried on in the field and in the home. Moreover, it should be noted that the provisions of this section do not at any time reduce the appropriations for vocational rehabilitation of those injured in trades and industries.

In further explanation the situation in detail is as follows:

This section relates solely to appropriations for vocational education. It does not affect in any way vocational rehabilitation of persons injured in industry, which is taken care of in the act of June 5, 1924, and in the act of June 9, 1930. Nor does this section reduce or otherwise interfere with either agricultural extension work or agricultural experiment stations under the Purnell Act or its predecessors. This section relates to vocational education.

The section does not affect any appropriation, either permanent or annual, for the fiscal year 1933. It does not begin to operate until after June 30, 1933, so that the section does not affect contemplated State programs for the fiscal year beginning July 1 of this year.

The existing appropriations for vocational education total $9,102,000. Of this sum $7,367,000 is a permanent annual appropriation made by the Smith-Hughes Act of February 23, 1917. The Smith-Hughes Act allocates $3,000,000 annually to vocational education in agriculture, $3,000,000 annually to vocational education in home economics and trade and industrial subjects, $1,000,000 to the training of teachers, $200,000 annually to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for administrative purposes, and $167,000 annually to provide that each State shall receive the minimum allotment of $10,000 for each of the three separate purposes of the act. These appropriations—amounting to $7,367,000—are permanent annual appropriations, and so do not come to Congress for the usual annual action by the Congress.

The purpose of subsection (b) of section 303 is the gradual withdrawal of the Federal aid to vocational education begun in the Smith-Hughes Act. This is accomplished by reducing the amounts appropriated for each fiscal year by 10 per cent of the amounts now appropriated. As a result, the appropriations for the fiscal year 1934, under that act, will be 10 per cent less than the appropriations for the fiscal year 1933. For the fiscal year 1935 the appropriations will be 20 per cent less than the appropriations for 1933, and so on, until the appropriations for the fiscal year 1942 will be but 10 per cent of the 1933 appropriations, and for the fiscal year 1943 and following years no appropriations whatever will be made under the Smith-Hughes Act. The reduction for each year is spread through the various items, so that the $3,000,000 appropriation for education in agriculture is reduced $300,000 annually, that for education in home economics and trades and industries by the same amount annually, and that for teacher training by $100,000 annually. Likewise the minimum allotment to each State, now $10,000, is reduced $1,000 each year; and the amount appropriated for the purpose of providing such allotments, a total of $167,000, is reduced by 10 per cent in each year.

Subsection (c) of section 303 substitutes for the annual appropriation permanently made by the Smith-Hughes Act to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, for administrative purposes, amounting to $200,000, an authorization for an appropriation of the same amount, the effect, of course, being to permit Congress to reduce the appropriation to the board in such amounts as it may deem proper, as the work of the board is gradually diminished.

The Reed-Moses Act of February 5, 1929, authorized appropriations for the purposes of the Smith-Hughes Act. The authority was for an appropriation of $500,000 for the fiscal year 1930, and for appropriations for the four succeeding fiscal years, increasing by $500,000 each fiscal year. Under this act $1,400,000 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1932. The independent offices appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the fiscal year 1933. If the maximum authorized appropriation for this year had been made for the purposes of the Reed-Moses Act, $2,000,000 would have been appropriated. The maximum authorized appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, is $2,500,000. Section 303 (a) of the bill provides that instead of an authorization of $2,500,000 for this purpose for the fiscal year 1934, only $1,500,000 will be authorized—the same amount as is appropriated for this coming fiscal year. Since the authorization contained in the Reed-Moses Act expires by its own force at the end of the fiscal year 1934, the effect of the committee's action is to reduce by $1,000,000 the amount authorized to be appropriated.

The Reed-Moses Act also authorizes an annual appropriation of $100,000 to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for administrative purposes. This authorization will also expire with the remainder of the act, and it is not affected by the bill. The power to reduce this authorization is left with the Appropriations Committee and Congress.

The benefits of the Smith-Hughes and Reed-Moses Acts were extended to Hawaii and Porto Rico by the acts of March 10, 1924, and March 3, 1931, respectively. The latter acts authorize $30,000 annually for Hawaii and $105,000 annually for Porto Rico. The authorization for Porto Rico allocates $30,000 to agriculture, $30,000 to home economics, $30,000 to trade and industrial work, and $15,000 to teacher training.

Subsection (d) cuts $3,000 from the Hawaiian authorization in each successive year for 10 years, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, so that no authority for further appropriations will exist at the end of that time. Porto Rico is similarly treated, the authorization being cut $10,500 each year. The amount allocated to each item of the Porto Rican appropriation is reduced 10 per cent in each year, in conformity with the reduction applied to corresponding items under the Smith-Hughes Act. The policy as to Hawaii and Porto Rico, effected by subsection (d) of section 303, conforms in every respect to the policy as to the States, effected by the other subsections of section 303.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment. On page 15, line 14, strike out the figures "1934" and insert "1935."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: On page 15, line 14, strike out "1934" and insert in lieu thereof "1935."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposal, as I see it, that has no part whatever in this bill.

As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has said, we are dealing with a deficit and the need for economy now, and this proposal is to save nothing whatever during the next fiscal year. It is aimed, however, with all due deference to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], directly at the public schools of this country. Throughout all of the farming regions, as well as in the cities, the school system has been built up upon the basis of the Federal Government contributing to vocational-education work. It is true that the Department of Agriculture appropriations do carry items that go to agricultural vocational work in the home and on the farm, but that is one thing and the vocational work in the schools is entirely another thing, and this cuts that off effectively after 10 years.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not the gentleman think this is one piece of cooperation between the States and the Federal Government that pays as large dividends as any investment the Government has ever made?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no doubt in the world about that. If we are going to stop cooperation with the States, there are any number of places where economy could be effected much better than here, and in this proposal there is no economy during the next fiscal year.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Alabama referred to the experiment-station work. Is it not a fact that this is about the only way we have to get back to the boys and girls and the farmers the real work carried on at the various experiment stations?

Mr. SIMMONS. This takes into the schools the type of work that the experiment station takes to the farm.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MANLOVE. Is it not a fact that the amount appropriated for vocational education represents only one-fifth of 1 per cent of the total expenses of our Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know just how much it is in proportion.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. Has the gentleman given any attention to the particular number of young men and women who are engaged in studying in these schools at night, working during the day in order that they may have an opportunity to advance themselves in the field of education?

Mr. SIMMONS. I only have those figures for my own State.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman, as well as the committee, will be interested to know, I am sure, that for the entire country during the last year there were 153,384 young men and women who took advantage of this particular feature of this law and did the best they could to remove themselves from the handicap of a lack of education; and for this reason alone, if for no other, it seems to me, therefore, that certainly this subtitle should be eliminated and the excellent vocational-education work continued as at present.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is making a contribution toward developing better citizens far beyond what it costs the Federal Government or the States.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. Is it not true that a great many of these schools will have to do away with the practical good of vocational education if Federal aid is withdrawn?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman whether in this comprehensive economy bill there is any place where they skip the fiscal year 1933 and start in on economies for the next 10 years after that?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know about that. I know it is being done here and there is no justification for it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Would it be fair in any sense to economize and not meet our obligation in this respect when the States have already mapped out their programs?

Mr. SIMMONS. The States have already mapped their programs and they are built up with respect to and in reliance upon this contribution.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I have watched the gentleman vote in this House and I know the gentleman is in favor of economy, but I do not believe the gentleman is in favor of economizing at the expense of the education of the children of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not in this way; no.

Mr. ALLGOOD. And I do not believe the House is in favor of economizing in this way. In fact, I have talked with a great number of the Members of this House since this provision was incorporated in the economy measure and it has been my privilege to urge each one of these Representatives to help defeat this part of the bill, and I know that a majority of the House is now opposed to discontinuing Federal appropriations to vocational education.

There is to-day no industry in this Nation in worse plight than agriculture. There is no class of people whose incomes or purchasing powers are as low and as nearly depleted as those of the farmer. Discontinuance of Federal aid will possibly mean that our rural schools will have to discontinue the teaching of scientific agriculture. To-day I had a letter from a farmer who is a patron of a vocational agricultural school. He told me that his two sons had learned more in two courses in vocational agriculture than he had learned in 30 years of experience on the farm. In my district there are 14 vocational schools, and in each of these communities our citizens have contributed out of their own funds and taxes for the erection and equipment of special buildings. There are more than 1,500 boys and girls being trained in a practical way to meet the problems of home and farm life. We all realize the great necessity of this character of education when there are several millions of men and women in this country who are now out of employment and can not make a living because they do not have this character of education. The old system of education prepared the students largely for white-collar jobs. Vocational education is practical education. It educates the hand as well as the head. It gives the boys and girls pride and confidence in doing things. It is a sound type of Americanism.

I repeat again, I am for economy; but if this section is not stricken, I will oppose the bill and vote against its enactment.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is to strike out the section, while the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska is to change the date for one year. Of course the gentleman from Nebraska is in favor of striking out the section.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offered the amendment in order to get the floor. I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to section 303 of the bill and I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which only postpones the evil day one year, and the amendment ought not to be considered.

The vocational education bill passed by Congress has been so very helpful and popular throughout the entire country that it would be most unfortunate to discontinue the same. It is performing a remarkable service for the tradesmen, the farmers, and all women, both on the farm and in homes of our industrial centers. Education is suffering materially because of lack of funds in many of the States. A further crippling of our educational institutions will accentuate the spirit of unrest which is now broadcast in the country.

The States and localities have incurred heavy expense in the construction of buildings and equipment for these vocational schools. We should improve our school systems rather than eliminate one of the most important departments in the rural schools.

Vocational agriculture is the most beneficial farming agency we have to-day, and is making more progress than any other educational group. To discontinue these Federal appropriations would penalize the rural districts and place the burden on the common people.

The amount contributed by the Federal Government for this form of education encourages the States and localities to contribute to their support, and the three together make a success.

We hear much in this day and time on the subject of farm relief. I do not know of anything that can be done for the farmers that would be more helpful than to educate the young men on the farms in the best methods of agriculture and enable them to make it a success and profitable.

These schools are doing work that meets with the hearty approval of the country people, those who live on the farms and are engaged in the basic industry.

When agriculture succeeds all business succeeds, when agriculture fails and lags all business is affected thereby. I regard Federal aid for vocational schools the most important thing that is being done by the Federal Government in cooperation with the States. We are spending millions of dollars each year in cooperation with the States in the building of highways, and I am heartily in favor of its continuance. If Federal aid for vocational schools is withdrawn during the next 10 years, it will encourage the discontinuance of Federal aid to roads, which would be, indeed, most unfortunate. We spend millions of dollars in cooperation with the States in all branches of agriculture, animal industry, plant industry, Forest Service, entomology, economics, grasshopper control, and so forth, but none of these activities are more important than the education of the young men and women along the lines of agriculture, trades, and home economics. It would be the poorest form of economy to discontinue this splendid work that is meeting with so much success.

I sincerely trust that this section providing for the elimination of Federal funds for vocational schools during the next 10 years will be voted out of this measure by a practically unanimous vote, so that there will be known and understood throughout the country the views of the Congress in connection with this educational program. It required years of time to make the beginning; now it would be most unfortunate to destroy it when its success and usefulness has been so thoroughly demonstrated.

I am in favor of economy, but this, in my opinion, would not be economy. We can not afford to economize at the expense of the young men and women of the country in destroying their opportunities for education and training that will enable them to make a success in life. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on this amendment is exhausted under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Page 15, line 14, strike out the figures "1935" and substitute "1936."

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Chairman, the original intention of the Economy Committee was to include a provision in this bill, H. R. 11597, which would eliminate for one year the appropriation for vocational education. However, when their bill finally made its appearance on the floor of the House this provision was conspicuous by its absence, but in its stead we find section 303, providing eventual death for this appropriation by slow and polite strangulation. This section should here and now be removed from the bill and thrown out the window.

Section 303 leaves the appropriation as it is for the next fiscal year and then provides for a gradual reduction year by year until the appropriation is practically wiped out at the end of the tenth year. Why this attempt to look so far ahead regarding this activity when provision after provision in this bill relating to such important subjects as pay cuts, suspension of half holidays, reductions and promotions, reduction of travel allowances, and limitations on expenditures for printing and stationery contain a limitation restricting the application of all of these provisions to "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933"?

In other words, these provisions affecting many reductions and changes relate only to this present financial crisis, and in no way attempt to hamstring Congress in facing these problems a year hence, at which time we all hope and pray conditions in the United States will be vastly improved. Many of the provisions in this bill will be inoperative after June 30, 1933. Not so, however, with section 303.

The Federal Government by this appropriation for vocational education during the past few years has made it possible for thousands upon thousands of our boys and girls, who for financial reasons were unable to attend college, to prepare themselves for their life work by receiving vocational education, particularly in trade and industry, agriculture and home economics. I am especially familiar with the benefits accruing from instruction thus far given in agriculture and made possible by this appropriation.

For years all kinds of suggestions have been made for farm relief. Some are nonsense, while some are sound. In my opinion, scientific training in agriculture as made possible by this appropriation for vocational education is without question the best and sanest form of farm relief.

A scientifically trained rural citizenry will realize that the problem of farm relief in general, and overproduction and businesslike marketing specifically, is within and among themselves. Farming has arrived at such a condition of skill that persons without proper training will not be able to continue on the farms. Prospective young farmers must be given instruction in production and marketing if we are ever going to have any farm relief, and conditions in this country will never be normal until overproduction ceases to a great extent and the horrible spread between the price the farmer actually receives for his products on the farm and the price the housewife pays for these same products is eliminated.

Speaking of economy, the elimination of this appropriation will be false economy. In recent years this House has passed bills appropriating thousands of dollars for the erection of monuments in honor of Indian chiefs, of whom not one-tenth of 1 per cent of our population ever heard; millions of dollars to dredge and widen streams barely navigable by punts, and untold sums of money to reclaim and irrigate waste land when a vast number of fertile acres were growing up to bushes in other sections of the country, and I might go on and on.

And now when it is proposed to continue an appropriation for vocational education—an appropriation that dollar for dollar has in results accomplished as much as any like amount ever before appropriated by the Federal Government—an attempt is made to strangle it.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. I hope the gentleman will excuse me, but I prefer not to be interrupted at this time.

The farm urgently needs the trained man and woman as never before. Eliminating this appropriation would throw many trained teachers out of employment and cause many boys and girls to leave school and return to the farm without the proper education and training for their future welfare. It would greatly curtail the development of a type of education which is bringing values to the life of many communities far in excess of its cost to the town, State, and United States and at a time when those values are most needed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes; but for a brief question only, as my time is very limited.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I indorse what you are saying, except that part which refers to 1936. I think the section should be eliminated entirely. It is not in the interest of economy.

Mr. SNOW. The gentleman should realize that the parliamentary situation is such that the only possible avenue open to me in order to be heard in opposition to the elimination of the appropriation for vocational education was to offer the amendment I have just sent to the Speaker's desk. If I could have my way, I would make it the year 2036. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I realize the parliamentary situation and indorse the splendid address the gentleman is making.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it not a fact that the Federal Government is contributing to the States for military education, and should not it contribute for vocational education?

Mr. SNOW. Only one answer can properly be made to the question of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman now be kind enough to yield to me?

Mr. SNOW. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I simply want to say at this point, that I have followed the record of the gentleman from Maine on agriculture and public education very closely. He is one of the best-informed men in Congress on agriculture and I think he is to be congratulated in his district and State for the stand he has always taken to protect public education and to advance the interest of agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes; but please be brief.

Mr. YON. Does not the gentleman from Maine think that if the appropriation for vocational education is eliminated it will upset the school system throughout the country?

Mr. SNOW. In the gentleman's State of Florida as well as in my home State it will take away from hundreds of boys and girls the privilege of obtaining instruction in trade and industry, agriculture and home economics.

Please bear in mind that the children of this country are not in any way responsible for the financial crisis we are now passing through.

They still are entitled to and deserve our continued thought and care. If anything, they are entitled to greater educational opportunities and facilities in this period of depression than even during past prosperous years when parents were better able to finance the costs of education.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute by the gentleman from Maine and in favor of the amendment by the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this is a sad day in this Congress, when we see some men get up and oppose the continuation of vocational education in our country.

I wish to give you some figures that are interesting. Vocational education last year received an appropriation of $32,000,000, and only about $7,000,000 of that was from the Federal Government.

In the classes enrolled there were more than a million of young people taking vocational education. It is not confined to the rural communities, even though these were doing splendid work in practically every State in the Union. Then there is the vocational trade school in the cities and also the evening classes and part-time schools doing splendid work, where hundreds of thousands of boys and girls are engaged in this work. There are more than a million of these young people benefiting from this work, and it would be a tragedy to break faith with these classes and fail. We can not afford to do it—we must not, we will not. In my own State and other sections which I have visited, the vocational agricultural school is the center of community life in many instances. I know community after community where people have sacrificed and mortgaged their homes in order to help build and carry on this work. They have both the agricultural work for boys and the home economics for girls.

In times like this we ought not to withdraw Federal aid for such work as our vocational schools, for it is not economy during any period, and everyone can see that this provision is entirely out of harmony with the most of the bill, for this proposes to permanently abolish this work, and does not effect one penny of economy for the year 1933. Then what is this measure and its purpose to abolish vocational education for good and for all time and break faith with the States and our people?

I want to say something to some of these economy experts. I favor economy as much as anyone, and can see some very large economies we should make, for I think the waste in government must be cut out and no service of government should be established or continue which does not render more in service than it costs. But I do not believe in reducing the income of a class of people who now have an insufficient income. And I oppose the proposition to eliminate a service which has justified itself like vocational education. This is, in my judgment, some of the most valuable money appropriated by our Government.

Let me say this to some of those economy experts who advocate the elimination of vocational education: Just two years ago practically all of you supported a measure to give back to the income-tax payers, some of whom at that time had net incomes of more than $10,000,000—enough to carry on this work for nearly 25 years. There were less than 40 Members of this House who opposed that, and as I have shown from time to time with a few others the fallacy of this legislation, not one man in the light of years has defended it. O my colleagues, let us not fail the people at this time. It is true the eyes of the people are on us, and we must not fail them.

I hope the Cannon amendment will be agreed to, and then this valuable work will continue to give its benefits and spread to every section of our country.

Can this country, in a progressive age like this, afford to stop education and progress and turn backward 40 years? It can not, and we shall meet the test by carrying forward this valuable work. I hope at an early date, when I can get more time, to give more in detail some facts in reference to this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will send his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: Page 15, line 14, strike out "1934" and insert "1939."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the provision in this bill gradually eliminates the funds for vocational training and is typical of the spirit of the so-called economy under which we are operating. I am sure that the committee in its desperation simply closed its eyes and reached out and grabbed anything it could put its hands on, regardless of the merits of the proposition. It has been repeatedly stated on the floor of the House that as to wages, if we went below the $2,000 exemption, 70 per cent of the employees or 75 per cent would be found to be in that category. Hence the greatest economy is to be made out of the salaries of the lowest-paid employees. There is no recommendation in this bill to reduce the subsidies given to the private shipowners. There is no recommendation in the bill to reduce the subsidies given to the operators of air mail. There is no suggestion here of a moratorium on the interest of Government bonds for one year. After the committee deducted 11 per cent of the wages of the employees, the bill seeks to gradually eliminate all activities of the Federal Government for vocational education. My city alone appropriates for education over $10,000,000 a year. We will get along without this appropriation, but we are interested in education as a national proposition. [Applause.] My State perhaps will pay the greater portion of this appropriation. I take sharp issue with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], usually correct, when yesterday he so forgot himself as to take the floor and revert back 30 years and try to array the workers of the city against the producers on the farms. That speech will ring as a discordant note for a long time, particularly that part where he said, "We farmers must stand for this economy bill because the representatives of the city are opposing these reductions."

In reply to that, speaking for the workers of my city, I say to the gentleman that we are opposed to eliminating appropriations for vocational training for the people of the gentleman's State. The new spirit of this day is the common understanding between the farms and the cities, because as long as we are kept apart each is being exploited by a handful of people who are urging this economy bill.

ACTIVITIES OF THE BOARD

The activities or responsibilities of the Federal Board for Vocational Education are prescribed under the terms of the national vocational education act, the rehabilitation act, and other acts complementary thereto. In general they may be grouped under six different headings:

Administrative: The board is responsible (1) for certifying to the Treasury Department the allotments to the States as provided under these acts; (2) for ascertaining that Federal funds are actually used for the purposes for which they are appropriated.

Advisory: The board is called upon to advise State boards with regard to the proper use of funds, to the preparation of State plans to meet the varying conditions existing in the several States, in order that the work may be best adapted to the situation existing in individual States, and to the development and promotion of programs on a statewide basis.

Service: A general cooperative service is rendered to other Government departments, to State boards for vocational education, to local educational authorities on request of State boards, and to a large variety of national business, industrial, agricultural, and educational associations.

The general character of this service is indicated as follows:

First. Assisting States in developing more effective programs of teacher training.

Second. Assisting industrial, commercial, and business organizations to develop programs for the training of their employees.

Third. Cooperation in vocational education surveys.

Fourth. Making analyses of training needs for specific occupations.

Fifth. Conducting special schools of instruction.

Sixth. Establishing foreman training as a phase of industrial education.

Seventh. Conducting conferences of employers and labor to define local needs for vocational training.

Eighth. Assisting other departments of the Government in connection with their problems of vocational training.

A somewhat detailed list of the organizations and groups with which the board has cooperated is attached to this letter.

Research: The board is responsible under the several acts which it administers for making studies and investigations in the field of vocational education as specified in the act. It is also responsible for bringing the results of such studies to the attention of State and local authorities engaged in the operation and promotion of programs of vocational education through the personal services of its staff and through publications.

Quasi judicial: Under the terms of the vocational education act the Federal board is specifically charged with wide powers of interpretation, in order that situations in different States may be effectively met. This power was conferred upon the board to avoid implanting by statutory provisions a stereotyped program on all States. The law as drawn is very general in its scope because Congress recognized that in the development of this new line of work many adaptations would be necessary as more experience was secured. The way in which this responsibility has been met is shown in the various administrative bulletins of the board.

In addition, the board is responsible for withholding funds in case a State has not expended them in accordance with the provisions of the acts under which they are appropriated.

Regulatory: This activity consists essentially in seeing that all programs where Federal funds are applied are operated in accordance with the general intent of Congress and the spirit of the act.

REASONS FOR ESTABLISHING AN INDEPENDENT BOARD

In enacting the vocational education act it is clearly apparent that Congress had in mind service to that group of young people and adults who were not being reached and efficiently served by the regular public schools. It was emphasized that the contemplated service should be of practical value, and that it should be directed by practical people.

Congress recognized that while generous provision had been made for vocational education for the professions, the great majority of young people and adult citizens who had dropped out of the regular public schools were in need of an opportunity to secure practical vocational education and training of less than college grade to meet their needs.

In view of the existing situation, Congress recognized that the program must be safeguarded if the large group of people, both young and old, who had left school and gone to work, or who were desirous of preparing themselves to go to work, were to be effectively served. The first purpose was to provide serviceable education and training to assist people to get a job, hold a job, or get a better job. The second purpose was to guard against the danger that this work might become so academic in character that it would fail to render the specific service intended.

The third purpose was to insure that the funds appropriated would be used for the purposes intended by Congress and that they would not be diverted to support forms of general education which Congress believed were already adequately financed.

Furthermore, it is apparent that Congress recognized that vocational education is essentially an economic agency in that training for work directly affects the interests of many groups, such as employers, employees, and the general public. In order to secure equitable representations of all interests affected, Congress provided a representative board on which labor, the employer, and other interested parties were represented, and it conferred upon this board advisory, regulatory, and quasi-judicial functions. These intests of Congress are very clearly set forth in statements made on the floor of the House by the Hon. Irvine J. Lenroot and others on December 11, 1916, excerpts from which are attached to this letter.

OPPOSITION MET UP TO THE PRESENT TIME

In general, it may fairly be stated that the opposition which exists is largely the result of misinformation and misunderstandings as to the work of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. As a result of these misunderstandings and misrepresentations the report has been circulated that the board dominates State programs and dictates standards to individual States and local communities within those States. This is untrue. The standards required by the board are only those set up in the acts, and such interpretations as have been agreed to in conference between representatives of the board and official representatives of State boards. The board operates no schools directly, employs no teachers, and enters into the picture only so far as Federal funds are used. Any State is perfectly free to set up any kind of an educational program that it wants without any regard to any Federal standards or interpretations of the Federal board so long as Federal funds are not involved.

In the great majority of cases opposition arising through misinformation or misunderstanding has come from college representatives who have not participated in the program, many of whom are connected with privately owned or endowed institutions and foundations. These individuals have little first-hand information concerning the program and little or no actual experience in public-school work. In many cases educators at first indifferent or even actively opposed have entirely changed their point of view after having come in contact with the programs which have been developed in their States and local communities.

Sources of opposition: Among the specific sources of opposition are, first, those who oppose the act as such, without any regard to the form in which it is administered. This opposition has been based upon the grounds that any form of Federal aid is unconstitutional. Second, that any recognition of any difference between vocational education and general education is socially undesirable.

Third. Certain leading authorities in general education connected with the faculties of institutions which make a specialty of training school administrators, have taken the position that vocational education is undemocratic because it closes the door of opportunity to some who might desire to go to college, and tends to create class distinctions because vocational education does not satisfy college-entrance requirements. One effect of their teaching has been to affect the attitude of many school administrators unfavorably toward the whole question of vocational education of less than college grade as a part of the public-school system.

Fourth. Some opposition has been expressed to the advisory and service activities of the board carried out through representatives of the board working in various States and communities at the request of the State authorities. This has come mainly from representatives of institutions of college grade who have felt that such advice and service should come from their institutions rather than from the Federal board.

Fifth. Objections to rulings of the board in its quasi-judicial functions. These have not been numerous. In certain cases, however, objection has been raised to the board's rulings because of a belief on the part of certain educational authorities that Federal funds should be placed at their disposal without any accompanying standards or restrictions of any kind as to the use of such funds.

As evidence that this type of opposition has not been important, it may be stated that while the national vocational education act specifically provides that any State may appeal to Congress from rulings made by the Federal board, no appeal has been made during the entire time that the board has been in existence.

Sixth. There has been some opposition to the standards set up in the act itself and to the interpretative rulings of the board. These objections are, in general, due to the fact that certain school administrators fail to see that the standards set up in general education and appropriate for that work are not appropriate for vocational education. Because of its practical character, vocational education calls for the employment of occupationally competent workers as teachers, the securing of time sufficient to insure that thorough education or training can be given to insure ability to make good on some definite job or employment level, and proper restrictions on the number of people trained for employment with regard to those already competent to do the work who are seeking employment and other necessary safeguards of that character. Such standards do not correspond to those set up in the general educational field and must be met in order to insure that the program shall accomplish what Congress expected it to accomplish.

Seventh. Some objection has also been developed with regard to the requirements in the act that the board shall annually ascertain that Federal funds have been used for the purposes for which they were appropriated. This objection has not been serious nor has it been widespread, but it has existed in certain cases, chiefly from a group of individual theorists having no official connection with the program.

REASONS FOR CONTINUANCE OF THE PROGRAM UNDER AN INDEPENDENT ESTABLISHMENT

First. The conditions which existed in 1917 and which led to the passage of the original act still exist to-day. In fact, these conditions have been aggravated by technological displacement and by more rapidly changing conditions.

Second. Such opposition as existed in 1917 on the part of general educators still exists to-day, possibly in a somewhat more intensified form, hence the need for the safeguards set up by Congress, including representative control, are even more necessary to-day than they were in 1917.

Third. The group which Congress had in mind to serve needs protection to-day as much and even more than it did in 1917. The belief by certain persons that this group should not be given vocational training at public expense is as strong to-day as it was in 1917. The safeguards set up by Congress are as necessary to-day as they were 14 years ago. The recognition of the need and the desirability of a protected special service to this group was so thoroughly recognized in 1917 that most employer organizations, the American Federation of Labor, and many other national organizations joined in advocating the act under independent, representative control. The legislation was passed by Congress in both Houses by unanimous vote. In passing this legislation, Congress recognized that a democratic system of education must provide varying opportunities to meet varying needs rather than one standard opportunity leading through the college to the professions.

Wherever the Federal board has worked in cooperation with State boards for vocational education, with national organizations of all kinds, with labor organizations, and with representatives of industrial organizations, the economic value of the service rendered has been acknowledged, as is shown by many statements in the files of the board. The policy of the board in utilizing the principle of conference with parties interested has almost invariably resulted in a settlement of any disputed points to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.

A review of the 14 years during which the board has been in existence has shown no case where the interested parties have protested against anything with which the board has been concerned in the way of the promotion of programs and aiding the States in the carrying on of the work. On the other hand, in the case of such organizations as the American Federation of Labor, the United States Chamber of Commerce, national manufacturers' associations, and many others, resolutions commending the work of the board have been voluntarily adopted on numerous occasions.

PARTISAN POLITICS DID NOT ENTER INTO THE CONSIDERATION AND PASSAGE OF THE VOCATIONAL EDUCATION ACT (SMITH-HUGHES ACT, FEBRUARY 23, 1917)

The national vocational education act passed by Congress February 23, 1917, was in no way a partisan measure. Those who have any misgivings should read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the years 1914 to 1917 and note the debates by many Congressmen of both major political parties and statements inserted in the RECORD by laymen, chambers of commerce, manufacturing associations, agricultural groups, and labor organizations in behalf of this law. From these it is thoroughly evident that at no time did political partisans endeavor to capitalize or claim party credit for the passage of the act.

The facts are that Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, and Representative Davis, of Minnesota, both well-known Republicans, championed the first bill. Senator Page, Republican, of Vermont, and Representative William B. Wilson, a Democrat, later Secretary of Labor in the Cabinet of President Wilson, sponsored the bill in its second stage.

Senator Hoke Smith and Representative Hughes, both Democrats from the State of Georgia, were members of the President's commission of 1914, this commission being created to make a study of the need for such legislation. Senator Smith was chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor in the Senate, and Representative Hughes chairman of the Committee on Education in the House.

When the vocational education act was being considered during the sessions of 1916 and 1917 many Members of the House and Senate, both Democrats and Republicans, vied with each other to advance the measure, and expressed their enthusiasm in its behalf. During the debate in the House Members complimented and praised Mr. Hughes.

Only two Members of the House—Mr. James Slayden, of Texas, and Mr. Finis Garrett, of Tennessee—questioned the advisability of its passage, and they feared it might interfere with certain State rights. On its final passage they did not vote against it.

The RECORD shows that on the final passage of the bill in the House the whole body was so elated that the Members arose en masse and vigorously applauded.

Never at any time were party lines drawn. There is no record of allusion to political party credit in any of the debates. Undoubtedly, the American people should be proud of the fact that this great educational, humanitarian measure passed Congress by a unanimous vote.

REASONS WHY CONGRESS CREATED AN INDEPENDENT REPRESENTATIVE BOARD TO ADMINISTER VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 16, 1916]

Resolution from outside organizations in regard to composition of board (64th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 53, pt. 5, p. 4178):

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have upon our calendar reported with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Education and Labor the bill providing for vocational education, which was prepared by the joint commission under a joint resolution last year. The bill will be brought to the attention of the Senate in the near future, and I wish to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions that have been passed with reference to it.

The bill was submitted to the department of superintendence of the National Education Association; also to the American Home Economics Association; and also to the educational committee of the American Federation of Labor. All of these organizations have given, through committees, careful study to the bill, and they have indorsed it with one exception.

The bill as presented to the Senate provides for a board of control consisting of Cabinet members. The department of superintendence, National Education Association, and the American Home Economics Association each recommend that the board of control should be members selected outside of the Cabinet. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions

[From department of superintendence, National Education Association, February 24, 1916]

Resolved, That the department reaffirms its approval of Federal aid to vocational education as proposed in the Smith-Hughes bill and now before Congress. It believes, however, that the work to be done is so important and so diversified as to require the creation of a Federal board to administer the act, who shall give their undivided attention to the subject and who shall be representative of the educational interests to be served.

[From American Federation of Labor]

Resolved, That the executive council of the American Federation of Labor indorse the Smith-Hughes bill for industrial education with the declarations made by the National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education as contained in the quoted parts of the letter to Congress of January 27, 1916.

[From American Home Economics Association, February 25, 1916]

The American Home Economics Association, assembled in Detroit, reaffirms its approval of Federal aid to vocational education as provided for by the Smith-Hughes bill, recommended by the President's Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education and now before Congress.

The association believes, however, that the ends to be served are so important and so diversified as to require a Federal board the members of which shall give their undivided attention to the administration of the act and shall be representative of the interest to be served.

[From discussion in House of H. R. 11250 and S. 703 (64th Cong., 2d sess., vol. 54, pt. 1, pp. 720–721, December 11, 1916)]

Mr. Powers, in considering a section of the proposed bill permitting the Federal board to allot "any part of such appropriation to any United States department or bureau for the purpose of making any study or investigation, or any part thereof, under the provisions of the act," made the following comment:

In other words, if this board should be composed of educators as suggested, with the Commissioner of Education, of course, himself an educator, it would be within the power of the board to allot the entire $200,000, or any part of it, it might deem proper to the Bureau of Education to make these investigations. Those of us who are afraid that a Federal board would be appointed largely of educators believe that this section 6 should be so amended that the great industries of this country that the bill proposes to try to reach and help should have representation on the board, and that they should be called in from the fields of agriculture, and that the commercial interests should be represented. The purpose of the bill is to reach and prepare the students for useful employment. That is the idea of it; that is the foundation of it; that is the reason of its existence.

[64th Cong., 2d sess., pt. 1, pp. 175, 176, 177, December 11, 1916]

Mr. LENROOT. * * * I wish to discuss it now, rather than to wait until the bill shall actually come before us for consideration, because I think it is a matter of such importance that the success or failure of this bill when it is enacted into law will depend very largely upon how Congress shall deal with that fundamental point, and I sincerely hope that, between now and the time when this bill shall be actually considered by us, the membership of this House will give serious consideration to the matter that I propose to discuss. That matter is the method of the organization of this Federal board.

As Doctor FESS has stated, the Senate bill provides for an ex officio board composed of five members of the Cabinet. The House bill provides for a board consisting of five members, four of them to be appointed by the President of the United States, no more than two of whom shall belong to the same political body, and the fifth member, the Commissioner of Education, who shall ex officio be a member of the board. Now, to my mind, neither of these systems or methods will bring about the result that ought to be gained by the enactment of this bill. There are only two grounds upon which Federal aid for this purpose can to my mind be justified: One, to secure the establishment of practical standards of vocational education; second, to stimulate the States by Federal aid to accept these standards. I have no sympathy with the view sometimes expressed that the Federal Government should aid the States in carrying the burdens of vocational education. On the contrary, any State that to-day has any practical system of vocational education can well afford to continue it out of its own funds, for there is no expenditure that the State can make that will bring better or larger returns to it than a practical system of vocational education. But it is necessary to establish practical standards, and in order to secure the adoption of those standards it is necessary that Federal aid such as is proposed in this bill be given.

Now, the House bill provides that the Commissioner of Education shall ex officio be the chairman of the board; that four members shall be appointed by the President. And I am afraid that that is going to mean that the fixing of these standards and the control of this subject will be in the hands of general educators rather than in the hands of practical men. And I want to say very frankly that I do not believe general educators are qualified to fix standards for vocational education such as we ought to have in the United States. It is no reflection upon any general educator when I say that any more than it might be considered to be a reflection upon me if some one should say that I was not qualified to perform a surgical operation.

In the fixing of these standards we will agree that they should be practical standards. They should be standards such as, when adopted by the State, are going to result in training boys and girls for vocations. Is that going to be secured unless those standards are passed upon by practical men? If not passed upon by practical men, they will be fixed by an examination in the field, in the first instance, by trained men, it is true, college graduates, trained investigators in getting raw material, but who have never had any practical experience in industry or in trade. They in turn will send their reports in to the Bureau of Labor or other department, as the case may be. That raw material will be interpreted by experts who have never had any practical experience; and, finally, general educators through these channels will fix the standards, and they themselves are not practical men in these lines. So we have theory from beginning to end as against the fixing of standards by practical men. So it is my purpose at the proper time to offer an amendment providing, as the House bill provides, for five members of this general board, the Commissioner of Education to be a member ex officio, four members to be appointed by the President of the United States, but with the qualifications that one of those members shall be representative of labor, one of them representative of manufacturing, one representative of commerce, and one representative of agriculture. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that this method which I shall at the proper time propose is not only indorsed but it is urged by the United States Chamber of Commerce, by the National Association of Manufacturers, and by the American Federation of Labor.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LENROOT. Coming back to where I was interrupted, where I was stating that the method I proposed has the indorsement of the National Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the American Federation of Labor, I want to suggest that if upon any question the American Federation of Labor and the National Association of Manufacturers can agree, it is a matter of very serious consideration for the membership of this House. With reference to the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Members of the House no doubt have received a pamphlet from them where the Chamber of Commerce specifically asks for the amendment of the bill in the certain particulars that I propose to offer as an amendment here. The National Association of Manufacturers has adopted a resolution declaring that in their opinion that board should be made up of the interests specially to be advanced—labor, employment, and education. The American Federation of Labor in its report to the executive committee made at their annual convention last month used this language:

"We had hoped that the provisions of the act relative to the board would have been changed so that the Secretaries of the several departments of Agriculture, Interior, Commerce, and Labor would not have been delegated as the board. We felt that their duties are already altogether too onerous and too complex to have this additional responsibility thrust upon them. There is, in addition, a double danger in having department Secretaries serve as the Federal Board for Vocational Education—first, administrations and administrative officials are subject to quadrennial changes, and it has happened in the past that sometimes Cabinet members have been changed several times during an administration. This objection in itself should be sufficient for us to object to the Federal Vocational Education Board being so constituted. The second objection is a more serious one, namely, that of the possible injection of partisanship into the administration of this new field of educational effort.

"It is our opinion that this new board should be composed of representative men, but not partisan representatives of the administration in power. Its personnel should represent the great fundamental activities of life, namely, agriculture, labor, commerce, industry, and education, and the local advisory boards should be equally representative, so that the human activities of the Republic could feel assured that experienced, tested men from their own vocations, such as labor, commerce, agriculture, industry, and education, should be fairly and efficiently represented.

"It is our opinion that when this measure is once launched it should be directed along proper channels at the start. If we permit politicians to direct its energies, there is a danger that it may become a mere political adjunct of the party in power. If we permit the present academic educational group of the Nation to dominate, the whole force and virtue of genuine vocational trade training will be in danger of being lost sight of, and the Nation's appropriations will probably be misdirected along minor lines of endeavor, such as manual training, amateur mechanics, and other trifling, impractical, valueless schemes. Neither can we afford to permit this great measure to be overweighted by any special trade, commercial, or vocational interests. The agriculturists should not predominate, neither should the commercial or even the labor and industrial interests. We should insist that the board be properly balanced to start with, and that the interest of each of the great divisions of activity should be fairly and properly conserved, and unless we are otherwise instructed by this convention we shall make endeavors to change the proposed law according to the lines herein laid down."

That, Mr. Chairman, is the view of the American Federation of Labor. Now, I submit that the views of the manufacturers and of labor, when they agree upon a proposition like this, are entitled not only to weight in this House, but in a matter of this kind ought, it seems to me, to control, rather than the views of the general educators, who very humanly desire to have for themselves all the power that they can get. It is no reflection, as I said a moment ago, upon the general educators that they desire this power; but if this is to be a workable and successful measure, as I hope it will be, we ought to do everything within our power to make it practical in every sense of the word.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 769–770, January 2, 1917]

Mr. BORLAND. Is not a board a rather clumsy method of doing business?

Mr. FESS. No; not if it is a small board.

Mr. BORLAND. There is a tendency to create more boards than we really need. In fact, I very gravely doubt—and it is my one doubt about this bill—whether we need this Federal education board; and whether it would not be entirely better and more efficient and appropriate to have it managed by the Federal superintendent of education or Commissioner of Education.

Mr. FESS. I think the work is so very comprehensive that it ought to have a board of managers well equipped for this particular work.

[From CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3426—Conference Report No. 1495, February 16, 1917]

The measure as it passed the Senate provided that the Federal Board for Vocational Education be composed of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, and the board was authorized to select an advisory board of seven members. A number of experts and specialists were also authorized to assist the board.

The measure as it passed the House provided for the appointment by the President of a representative of manufacturing interests, a representative of commercial interests other than manufacturing, a representative of labor, and a representative of agriculture to act with the United States Commissioner of Education as a board of five to administer the act, and provided for the employment of such assistants as might be necessary.

The provision agreed to by the conferees is a blending of the two proposals, so that the new system is to be linked with the Government by the designation of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education as ex officio members of the board, and the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a representative of the manufacturing and commercial interests, a representative of the agricultural interests, and a representative of labor to act with them as members of the board.

The House receded from its amendments to the bill, which had the effect of merely "authorizing" the appropriations, and the appropriations are definitely made in the bill as reported from conference.

COST OF REHABILITATING THOSE DSIABLED IN INDUSTRY OR OTHERWISE

One of the acts administered by the Federal Board for Vocational Education is the act passed in 1920 known as the act for rehabilitating those disabled in industry or otherwise. During the life of that act 48,502 persons have been rehabilitated and put to work at a total cost of $12,757,457, or an average cost of $263.03 per person. The Federal cost was $6,193,410.20. The States expended $6,564,046.98. These handicapped people were being kept prior to rehabilitation by some taxing district or otherwise at a cost of from $300 to $500 annually. The average age of those rehabilitated was 32 years. The life expectancy of a person 32 years of age, according to the American-Canadian Expectancy Table, is 68 years, or 36 years additional. Fixing the cost of keeping these people at $300 per annum each, which is the minimum, it would have cost some taxing district or otherwise to keep these 48,502 people $14,550,600 annually. Multiply that by 36, the number of years they are expected to live, according to the expectancy table, and you have a total cost of $523,821,600.

Now, what was done? The Federal board, in cooperation with the States, rehabilitated these people at a total cost of $12,757,457. So you have a net saving in that one transaction of $511,064,143; but that is not all. One of the mid-Western States during the last seven years has rehabilitated 1,391 persons. Their average earning power after being rehabilitated over what it was prior to injury was $699.97. If that average would hold good with the 48,502, and fixing their working expectancy at 30 years instead of 36, as used in the first calculation, the increased earning power of those rehabilitated would amount to $1,018,498,348.20. You have saved in the cost of keeping these people $511,064,143 and at the same time you have added to their earning power $1,018,498,348.20, making a total of $1,529,562,491.20 during the life of this act. You have saved enough money in this one transaction alone to pay all the cost of the Federal board in Federal, State, and local money in all of its many activities for a period of 47 years.

That is only one side of the picture—the economic side that the Congress has spent so much time in discussing recently. Now let us look at the humanitarian side. It so often happens when these unfortunate cripples or handicapped people are at the head of a home, with dependents, a wife and children. When the head of the home becomes incapacitated, the home is broken up, the wife is sent to the workshop, the children are farmed out. A home is broken up, an irreparable damage has been done to society. The humanitarian side is even greater than the economic side. I seriously doubt if the Government, either Federal, State, or local, can show such marvelous results as that part of the work now being carried on by the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Will the Congress continue this humanitarian and economic work, or will it consolidate, transfer, or merge it into some other executive department, board, bureau, or commission that knows nothing about it? I hope not. Can any other department do this work as well as it is now being done? I seriously doubt it.

I appeal to you who are interested in your States and are in need of this appropriation to stand with us of the cities who are willing and anxious to cooperate with you in maintaining this splended activity. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, with each passing hour is being demonstrated how futile the efforts of this Economy Committee have been to save some money for the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has just harangued you, trying to make you think that only a few people in this country are asking for economy. I say to you that the taxpayers of this country are demanding that there be a reduction in governmental expenditures, and the only people who are opposing it are those who are selfishly interested. Take the items before us at the present moment. Every one of us has been receiving all sorts of telegrams and letters opposed to it. I hate to vote in favor of reducing this appropriation for vocational training, but it is only a temporary proposition. [Cries of "Oh, no."]

Mr. REED of New York. It has nothing to do with the present emergency; not a thing. It is to be eliminated 10 years hence.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It has to do with the present emergency. We got along without this vocational education for a long, long time. It has been productive of good, and it may be productive of good again and will be, but I wish the Members of this House to consider that we are facing an emergency. If we are to balance this Budget, we must make sacrifices all along the line.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I will ask the gentleman to state to the House whether there is a graduated scale proposed in this bill which, at the end of 10 years, will entirely eliminate this appropriation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. But if it were true, let me state the trouble with this entire business. I may as well state now what I have in mind. My idea is that if we keep up this 50 per cent business we will not only bankrupt the Government but we will bankrupt every State in the Union.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I know the gentleman desires to be correct in his statement, but the gentleman is obviously in error about the provision with reference to which he has just spoken. It does not call for any reduction in the next fiscal year, and therefore will not affect the 1933 Budget at all, but it does contain a graduated reduction of the appropriation so as to wipe it all out in 10 years. It does not affect the present depression in any way whatever.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Suppose that is true.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, it is true.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And admit that it is true. I want to say that if ever there was a time in this world when the Congress of the United States should be awakened to the danger that we are in, by reason of the Government appropriating money, money, money, it is now. We are not only involving the Government of the United States in debt, but we are involving every State of the Union in debt.

Mr. Chairman, I rose not so much in opposition to this particular item, but on account of the principle that is involved here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the adoption of the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, to strike out the figure "1934" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "1937."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama for the amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: Page 15, line 14, strike out the figures "34" and insert the figures "37."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, that it is dilatory and is for the simple purpose of securing time to address the committee. That has been repeated in a number of instances. There have been a dozen speeches, at least, in favor of striking out this section. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, because otherwise we will go on forever on this section.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Assuming all the gentleman says is correct, the Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama has come within the rules.

Mr. DYER. It is evident the committee intends to strike out the section. I think we ought to be permitted to vote upon it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has stated that this provision to eliminate the appropriation for vocational education was put into the bill to meet the present emergency; yet when we examine the language of the bill, we find the provision does not even commence to become effective until one year from July 1 next.

When we consider that this Government has a $4,000,000,000 Budget annually and that the appropriation for vocational education is some $7,000,000 annually we find that if the provision remained in the bill and the appropriation was wiped out, it would be a saving to the Federal Government of less than two one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. ESLICK. May I give the figures of such savings by vocational training in regard to agriculture?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman briefly. He is such a devoted friend of education and is always so able that I hope the gentleman will state for the benefit of the House one or two of the most important figures and let me incorporate all of them in the extension of my remarks.

Mr. ESLICK. In a 10-year period the boys in vocational training in my State deposited $3,823,084.06, a net saving over and above the contribution made of $2,383,485.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. As I understand it, this economy bill is before the House for the purpose of bringing about a balanced Budget at the end of the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It is all predicated on that proposition.

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I ask the gentleman if this particular provision in this bill in any way contributes one penny to that purpose?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not one red cent does this provision in this bill contribute to that purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield to permit the committee to state whether or not it is agreeable to have this section stricken from the bill?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma, if the committee wants to strike this provision from the bill, all that is necessary is for some member of the committee to make a motion to strike it. Every opportunity has been given for that purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. I appeal to the gentleman's colleague to ask him if he will not do that.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this vocational education was pioneered by that great leader of thought in this country, Theodore Roosevelt, and it was brought into being under the leadership of that other great leader of thought, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

Under the stimulus given vocational education by Federal aid the work is being carried on among children and among men and women in literally thousands of schoolrooms throughout the country. Millions of children and millions of men and women are engaged in vocational education in agriculture, in trades and industries, in home economics, in rehabilitation, and in the most important fields of human labor. The appropriations of many State governments for vocational education are contingent upon the Federal appropriation, and the States have spent thousands of dollars for school buildings and equipment, relying upon the receipt of the annual Federal appropriation. For the Federal Government to now cease this appropriation would be to break faith with these States and would perhaps in a number of States be a death knell to vocational education.

The provision in the bill destroying the appropriation would deprive thousands of farmers throughout the land of education on farm subjects which run the whole gamut from farm accounting to the conservation of the soil. It would deprive these farmers of an education which makes for the emancipation of the farm home through getting larger returns from smaller areas and fewer laborers, and thereby making it possible for the farm women to spend their time on home-making problems and the children to be free to attend school and prepare themselves for life and its battles. The provision would disorganize the program in evening and day schools of home-making classes composed of mothers and housewives who are striving for better health conditions, more adequate food, better living conditions, and greater happiness. It would disorganize the thousands of chapters of the Association of Future Farmers of America, composed of high-school boys who are to be the agricultural leaders of the future and who are being trained in scientific and practical agriculture.

It would close the door of opportunity to thousands of men and women who were denied the advantages of education and training in their youth and who now are struggling to make themselves better, more useful, and more intelligent citizens. The provision would deny thousands of men out of employment due to new machinery and new technology the opportunity to train and prepare themselves for work in other lines of endeavor. It would even deny the deaf and blind in our institutions that education and training which they must have to prepare themselves for life and its battles. There is no effort here to eliminate the great subsidies paid by our Government to the shipping interests and the other great interests of this country. This Congress voted an extension of the debt of Germany to the amount of $250,000,000 which in the opinion of many is but the first step toward the cancellation of all our foreign debts. Can it be that this House will now deny the small sum of some $7,000,000 to be used throughout the country for vocational education? I appeal to the membership of the House to strike from the bill this provision eliminating the vocational education appropriation and let us take a stand for the people—the people who too often are forgotten.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK]:

May I not quote the record of vocational education in Tennessee, showing what a blessing and profit it has been to the boys of my home State? Since July 1, 1918, the Government has spent there $853,179.55 on vocational education; the State has spent $586,419.37, or a total of $1,439,598.92. This money has been paid to teachers and in supervising training.

From July 1, 1921, to June 30, 1930, the boys taking vocational training in the high schools of Tennessee had from their labors on supervised farms a net income above expenses of $3,823,084.06. Take from this contributions, both State and Federal, leaves the large sum of $2,383,485.14 as a net profit. This is the only branch of the free schools in Tennessee where a boy can earn when he learns.

One other statement, in the last three years the Tennessee Association of Future Farmers of America, who are students of vocational training, have deposited in savings accounts $198,630.17 and have invested in farm land and livestock $706,515.63. Vocational education is doing a great work for the youth of the country. This bill destroys it beginning with 1934 and I am unalterably opposed to the destruction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment to that motion that all debate close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the motion.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that the provisions of section 303 of this amendment will completely eliminate at the expiration of 10 years all appropriations for vocational education. Those who have made that statement are under a misapprehension. The provisions of section 303 reduce in equal amounts over a period of 10 years the permanent annual appropriations for vocational education, but do not in any respect interfere with or reduce the appropriations made annually for vocational education.

The committee in inserting section 303 in the bill was doing nothing more nor less than carrying out the recommendation of a board which had been appointed to investigate the relationship between the Federal Government and the States in so far as education is concerned. That board reported in express language that vocational education and the contributions by the United States for that purpose should be gradually diminished so as to leave the field entirely to the States.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I decline to yield for the moment.

The board in its report stated that the vocational education act, the act authorizing and making appropriations for this purpose, in effect made the States in conducting their educational activities in this field completely subversive to the United States. The States could not obtain the money appropriated for these purposes unless they complied with the regulations laid down by the board. The commission which had been appointed to investigate this subject stated clearly that such subversion on the part of the United States was not in accord with sound principles of education.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I have declined to yield, I will state to the gentleman.

And so the commitee, when it inserted this provision in the bill, did nothing more nor less than to carry out the recommendations of the commission authorized to investigate the general question.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman inform us who paid the expenses of this commission in making its investigation?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I have not the faintest idea who paid for the investigation.

Mr. REED of New York. One of the large foundations paid for it and had an ulterior motive.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Now that the gentleman has yielded to the gentleman from Alabama, will he yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman name the members of this commission?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I can not name them.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Were they not connected with universities, and did they not receive large annuities?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The members were appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Who made up the personnel?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The personnel consisted of university presidents.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Name them.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I have not here the names of the members. It was a board of some twenty-seven members, as I recall it.

Mr. PARSONS. Was that the board of education that consisted of 52?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; I think not.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Was the Secretary of the Interior on that board?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. As I recall it, the Secretary of the Interior was on the board.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Who financed the report and paid the expenses of the board?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I do not know who paid the expenses of the board. The only information I have is that the board made a thorough study and investigation and submitted this report.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the board was paid from private funds furnished by the Rosenwald Foundation?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PALMISANO: On Page 15, line 8, strike out the entire section 303 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To suspend on June 30, 1933, the further operation of vocational education as provided by the act of February 23, 1917, and to suspend also vocational rehabilitation as provided by the act of June 2, 1920."

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Several Members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 18, line 11, strike out the period and insert the following: ", or to the printing and binding of farmers' bulletins under the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, there was so much confusion that we could not hear the amendment read. I ask unanimous consent that it may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I feel that when any provision in the economy bill seriously affects any Government department or bureau that the chairman of the subcommittee which makes appropriations for that department ought to advise the Members of the House as to what effect it has. Therefore, in the discharge of that duty, I state to this House that if this reduction of nearly $5,000,000 in the printing appropriation goes into effect there will not be one cent with which to print a single Farmers' Bulletin for the year 1933. Therefore we will have none to distribute and there will be none for the farmers to receive.

Let me call your attention to this fact: Senators and Members of the House distribute about 13,000,000 of these bulletins to farmers every year; the department distributes 2,500,000 every year, and 273,000 are sold by the Government every year. The receipts from these bulletins and other publications of the Department of Agriculture amount to $75,000 a year. The members of this committee ought to do one of two things: They should either provide for the printing of these bulletins and their free distribution, or provide that the Department of Agriculture may print them and sell them to the people.

What position would you be in next year when you get requests from farmers for these bulletins and you could not supply them? Over 2,000,000 farmers write for these bulletins every year, and what position would you be in if you had to tell them they could not be purchased at the Government Printing Office and you could not distribute them because the Congress had not provided for their printing, even though their average cost is only 1½ cents each.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. There was such a commotion I did not understand the gentleman's amendment. We can not understand what the gentleman is trying to do.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have offered an amendment exempting the cost of printing farmers' bulletins from the provisions of the economy bill, just the same as the economy bill exempts the printing fund of the Patent Office.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. This will also exempt the bulletins which are used in the cities because the term "farmers' bulletins" is a misnomer. There are just as many farmers' bulletins distributed in the cities as there are in the country districts, and for a very useful purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is true. They go to the cities the same as they go to the country districts. In my district a great number of requests for these farmers' bulletins come from the cities.

Mr. SCHAFER. I represent a city district, and I use all of my allotment. I could use two or three times as many more if I could get them. My constituents appreciate these valuable publications.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Unless this amendment is adopted and if this economy bill goes through, the gentleman will not have any.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am going to vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This section would cut $5,000,000 from the printing appropriation. All of the departments are compelled to print their administrative forms, and it will take all of the money to print these administrative forms, so that no farmers' bulletins can be printed. I have investigated it; I have consulted with the department and gone into it fully, and I tell you that will be the result. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the ground that the amendment is not germane and on the further ground that on its face the amendment shows it is not an economy but provides for an additional expenditure on the part of the Government.

The provision under consideration is limited to printing and the printing of one function of the Government, the Patent Office. It is fundamental that where there is a limitation applying to only one function you can not extend it by applying it to a second function.

Further as to the point of order that the purpose of the amendment is not economy but expenditure. It is obvious on its face that this proposal is not intended to have the prior provisions of this paragraph apply but to exempt them. The prior provisions would make it mandatory that the printing must be within a circumscribed amount. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas seeks to lift that amount and that the $200,000 which was carried in the present appropriation bill shall not be affected by these economy provisions as reported by the Economy Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. If the preceding paragraph of this bill is in order this is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. I am not for the amendment, but I think the amendment is in order.

The Chair will observe that the bill provides for certain reductions in the way of printing and binding, and leaves it up to the Director of the Budget as to how the funds for printing shall be distributed among the several departments. Of course he will distribute a reasonable proportion of the money available to the Department of Agriculture. The cost of printing farmers' bulletins is included. The proposed amendment has the effect of excluding the farm bulletins from their proportionate cut under the section. It seems to me the amendment is clearly in order.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Even if the exceptions were not in the bill regarding the exempting of the Patent Office printing, the amendment would still be in order. Otherwise we would be confronted with the proposition that the bill presented by the Economy

Committee could not possibly be amended in any respect where the result of the amendment would be to reduce the amount of savings which the provisions of the bill are seeking to make, and all the amendments we have heretofore adopted would be out of order because they tend to lessen, in some respect, the total amount of savings which the bill started out to make. Therefore it is proper to offer an amendment which lessens the amounts of the cuts carried in the bill, but which does not increase the amounts authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARBOUR. That does not mean the title.

The CHAIRMAN. It only means section 304.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute before the motion is put.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Arizona has preference.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, which I submit is always in order, that I may be allowed to speak one minute before the motion is put, because there is involved here the most vital prerogatives of this House and we should amend this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in the exercise of his discretion, will put the request, although the Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Arizona has precedence.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the subject matter of the gentleman's statement?

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that, with respect to the appropriation for printing, this limitation will make it absolutely impossible for the Members of the House to have the RECORD properly printed and impossible for them to have the printing done which is absolutely necessary to run the Houses of Congress, and I want to amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arizona that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Strike out of line 20, "$9,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000"; in line 23 strike out "$2,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500,000."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, there are two amendments here, of course. I am only proposing to increase the limit $1,000,000.

The printing last year cost $14,546,000, and this bill proposes to limit the amount that can be appropriated to $9,000,000, a cut of one-third.

All of you are interested in this proposition, because all of you want to get your documents, all of you want the departments to have proper printing done, and all of you want the RECORD properly printed.

The distribution of this fund last year amounted to $2,500,000 for the printing of the congressional proceedings proper, including the hearings and all that kind of thing.

You and I have been importuned, and I am holding down the printing of the hearings and the printing of a great many other things, and it is very disagreeable for me to do it. My colleagues are asking to have charts printed and asking to have duplicates of hearings printed and all that kind of thing, and I have been endeavoring to hold them down. However, this bill proposes to hold down the printing for the Congress, including all its activities, to $2,000,000, when it has been running $2,500,000. I am moving to amend that by fixing the amount at $2,500,000.

Mr. SANDLIN. If the gentleman will permit, this year the cost will be $3,000,000, and $1,000,000 more will have to be appropriated to take care of the printing.

Mr. STEVENSON. It will certainly take at least one-half million dollars more.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the gentleman think we can cut out the printing of a lot of documents, such as committee hearings? This will not interfere with the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at all, or interfere in any way with printing the proceedings on the floor of the House.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman were in the position I am, with the calls I have every day to print extra copies of hearings before this committee or that committee, and to put in extra charts and extra illustrations and all that kind of thing, which I hate to refuse my colleagues, but which I am having to do, he would realize that it is very hard to prevent the expenditures for printing of hearings.

Now, what were the items last year? Miscellaneous publications, $55,000; hearings proper before the committees, $215,000. This leaves $2,000,000 for everything else. If you cut out all the hearings, you would not have quite enough money out of this $2,000,000 to do the printing. When you scan the list that Congress has had printed, in so far as the $2,500,000 appropriation is concerned, it is the least you can get through with, and you will probably have a deficit at the end of the year then.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Binding is very expensive. Could we not cut some of that out?

Mr. STEVENSON. It may be expensive in some instances, but that is a matter Congress regulates, and it has a right to have the matter it has printed bound according to its desire, whether expensive or not. Now, gentlemen, I am only moving to increase this $1,000,000, and that cuts off four and a half million dollars. I do not think we will get through with it, but will have a deficit at the end of the year, and I trust that another body will have a whack at it, and they believe in printing and they furnish a lot of it, and we can not help it.

I am only asking for decent consideration for the rights of Congress to have printed and bound what is necessary. I am permitting a cut of one-third when I offer this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 19, strike out sections 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, and 313 down to and including line 8 on page 23.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I think I can point out some very good reasons for striking out these provisions of the bill which would discontinue the Army and Navy transports and the Panama Railroad Steamship Line.

I propose to confine myself to the Army Transport Service, though what I say is applicable also to the Navy Transport Service and to the Panama Steamship Line.

The Army Transport Service was established in 1898, at the time of the Spanish-American War. It was established because the private steamship companies could not render adequate service to the Government. Since that time the Army Transport Service has continued to operate efficiently and economically. This provision in the bill will not save money to the Government; it will cost money. If we discontinue the Army and the Navy transport systems and the service of the Panama Steamship Line, it will cost the Government more money than these provisions in the bill will save.

I want to submit for your consideration some figures in relation to the cost of the Army Transport Service for the fiscal year 1931. It cost to operate the sum of $3,838,583.58. If we add to that 3 per cent for depreciation of equipment and 3.6 for interest on the original cost, we find the total cost of operation of the Army Transport Service during the fiscal year 1931 to be $4,868,764.91.

If that same service had been rendered by the commercial lines and the regular commercial rates had been charged for transporting the same passengers and freight, it would have cost the Government $7,403,797.16, so that the operation of the Army Transport Service really saved the Government $2,535,032.25 for the fiscal year 1931.

I hold in my hand an estimate of the cost of the voyage of the Army transport Republic, which sails to-day from the Army base at Brooklyn to San Francisco by way of the Panama Canal, to Hawaii, Manila, back to San Francisco, through the Panama Canal, and returning to the base at Brooklyn.

These figures have been carefully prepared. They show that the total cost of this round trip of the Army transport Republic will be $300,000. If that same service was purchased from commercial companies and commercial rates were charged, it would cost the Government $716,155.62. Where, then, is the economy in discontinuing this service that has been rendered so efficiently since the Spanish War in 1898? What can we expect from these companies if we discontinue the Army Transport Service and turn this business over to commercial lines? That question was asked before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations for the War Department when representatives of the commercial steamship lines appeared in support of a similar proposal. They were asked what kind of accommodations would be furnished the enlisted men, and we were told that the men would be carried in the steerage. American soldiers will be sent to the Philippines, to the Orient, and to the Hawaiian Islands in the steerage with people of other nations, people of different races. Why, there would be international complications before the transport reached the Farallon Islands, 20 miles off the Golden Gate. Then here is another consideration. The commercial lines when they leave port and get 12 miles out at sea open their bars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object to the gentleman's request, but will he not extend his remarks?

Mr. BARBOUR. This is the only time that I have spoken on this bill, and I hope it will be the only time until it is passed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Alabama should let the gentleman from California go on for five minutes. He has made a study of the subject, and is the former chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on Army matters.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, when one of these commercial steamships, flying even the American flag, gets 12 miles out at sea, it opens its bar. On the Army and the Navy transports liquor is forbidden, and it is a good rule and a good regulation, when you have several hundred men, most of them enlisted men, on board for a long voyage.

Another consideration to which I direct your attention is that if we put our enlisted men into the steerage of these commercial ships, what will become of the secrecy of our military operations? They will be accessible to the representatives and agents of every foreign country. All kinds of information will be gathered from them as they are sailing on these ships.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is it not a fact that this is the only big nation in the world that maintains a transport service such as ours?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not care if it is. Because other nations do not maintain such a service is no reason the United States should not. We do lots of things in this country better than they are done in other countries. I understand that to-day Japan maintains its own transport service. That is the information that I have.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. On pages 8901 to 8905 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 25, 1932, the gentleman will find full and complete statements of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy opposing the abolition of the Army and Navy transport services, from the standpoint of economy, from the standpoint of national defense, and the morale and best interest of the enlisted men. If our American troops are to be carried down in the hold the way we were carried during the World War by private steamship companies, God help them, and I say that from my own actual experience. I sincerely hope that the gentleman's amendment will be adopted, and that we will continue to maintain the Army and Navy transport services, which are just as essential as an arm of our national defense as the ammunition for the guns.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, in line with the statement just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, this is no new proposition. At various times in the history of these transport services, this raid has been made on the service by the commercial steamship companies. It was made back in 1920, when Newton D. Baker was Secretary of War and Woodrow Wilson was President of the United States.

I have here a carbon copy of a report that was submitted by Secretary Baker to President Wilson when this question was then raised. I shall not take the time to read the whole report, but I will give you a few of Secretary Baker's conclusions. He found against the discontinuance of the transport service, because he said that transportation is an essential part of military movement; that our ships are highly specialized for the carrying of troops and supplies and that commercial ships are not; that commercial ships are not adapted to rendering this essentially military service; that sound military policy requires complete control of military movements. He further found that the ships are economically operated, and he recommended to President Wilson that the transport service be not discontinued. On May 15, 1920, President Wilson wrote to Secretary Baker acknowledging receipt of the report and saying "the judgment expressed in your letter is my own judgment." The matter also came up when William Howard Taft was Secretary of War, and he reported adversely upon it. It is an old question that is brought up every so often when the commercial steamship companies raid the Army and Navy transport service in order to get control of that little business, which is a special business and a special service that these ships render.

We have been generous to the American merchant marine. The Congress has passed laws that are indeed liberal to the American merchant marine. We grant them liberal loans for the building of new ships and make very liberal subsidies for the carrying of the mails. We may grant them more, if necessary, to properly maintain and operate an American merchant marine, but this Congress should say to the commercial steamship companies of this country that they must keep their hands off the Army and the Navy and our national defense.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. DELANEY. Is it not a fact that the adoption of the gentleman's amendment will mean an economy to the Government of about $2,000,000?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; if we adopt the amendment. There is no excuse for this provision in the bill, in the name of economy.

Mr. DELANEY. As the gentleman said a little while ago, this is the only country which maintains an Army transport service. Is it not true of the prohibition situation, that this is the only country which maintains a prohibition service?

Mr. BARBOUR. As far as I know, I think that question answers itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Unfortunately the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has included in his motion to strike out several paragraphs in this bill. I wish to address myself to the paragraph 312 in regard to the Panama Railroad Steamship Line. If this Congress desires to really save money and do away with something that is obnoxious, it will pass favorably upon this section 312.

The Panama Railroad Steamship Line was organized originally to carry supplies to the canal. When the canal was completed, it continued in operation and began operating in opposition to private lines carrying private business. It even extended its lines down to Central and South America; and when this was stopped, it did the un-American thing of contracting for the carrying of freight to Central and South America and carried this freight as far as the canal in its own vessels and entered into contracts with foreign lines to carry the freight on beyond. Here we have a Government line entering into contracts with foreign lines that compete with American lines in the transportation of goods to Central and South America. If you will do away with this service, you will get the same service and you will save $360,000 a year.

The total business of this line in 1931 was $1,870,000. Of that amount $1,263,000 was purely private business. The total business for the Panama Canal Commission, including the carrying of employees, was $384,911 or about one-fifth of its total business. The total freight carried was 163,000 tons, and only 27,000 of that was for the canal.

It admits for 1931 a loss of $244,000, but for freight carried for the Panama Canal Commission they placed a charge of $8 a ton, whereas private companies will haul that for $5.70 a ton. So they credit themselves with $8 a ton for the freight they carry to the canal. They must charge the Government for their services what the private lines would charge, so they charge $5.70 on that, and then they charge for commercial freight at the rate of $7.50 per ton. The private concerns will do all of this for $5.70 a ton. Private lines will handle the freight that is carried for the Panama Canal Commission at a saving of $74,000 a year.

Another vicious thing about it is that this line receives from the Government for carrying mail, $42,273, when, as a matter of fact, we are already paying subsidies to lines that cover the same routes, and whose boats go without mail, in order that this line can get $42,000 a year to try to make up the deficit that exists in the operation of their line.

The losses to the Government are as follows: There is an admitted loss which they put on their books of $244,000 a year. There is a loss of $74,000 in carrying the freight of the Panama Canal Commission, for which it charges $8 a ton, whereas private companies charge $5.70 a ton. Then we have absolutely thrown away $42,000 in carrying the mails, which other lines are ready and willing to carry and are paid to carry.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREE. No; I can not yield.

The claim will be made that this line is conducted for the employees and that they get low rates. They do, and there is a little pap handed out to Members of Congress, free transportation, because those people are politically minded, but I do not believe any Member will vote on this matter because he gets a free trip to Panama. If the Government allowed $30 to each employee, each way, to private companies, the Government would save $210,000 a year in transportation. The Panama Canal employees receive already, in addition to their pay, 25 per cent additional. To illustrate what that means, an employee with a salary of $2,000 receives $400 additional a year, and then it is argued that this line should be maintained to give them cheaper transportation back to the States every two years. One-half the revenues of the Panama Canal is paid by American shipping, and this money is used to pay losses to a competing Government line run on an un-American basis, which assists foreign shipping lines instead of aiding American-owned lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Barbour amendment, to strike out section 308.

Mr. Chairman, I am against the entire Barbour amendment. I believe in leaving these committee provisions in the bill. I have heard talk about national defense, and I heard my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], tell about when he went to France. We did not go to France on transports. They did not have them available. We went over on fruit steamers and we were down in the hold and the gentleman from Wisconsin knows—he was a private, as I was—that if we went over on transports we would still have been in the hold.

Mr. SCHAFER. I went on the Orduna in July, 1917. This boat was a passenger steamship, and I would not send my dog over in the steerage where we were quartered.

Mr. CONNERY. But the gentleman was down near the water.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, I guess below the water line, and Uncle Sam paid the regular passenger rates, and the men were herded, quartered, and fed like dogs. If the gentleman wants this kind of treatment for the soldiers, sailors, and marines he can have it. I do not want it.

Mr. CONNERY. In a transport the officer would be up on deck in his stateroom and the men would be down in the hold just the same.

Mr. SCHAFER. Far better to be in the hold of a transport with decent quarters, conditions, and rations than in the hold of one of the private steamship lines mingling, sleeping, and eating with the peoples of Asiatic countries.

Mr. CONNERY. There is no choice between those kinds of holds. They are all the same. [Laughter.] The only time we use these transports is in time of peace. The transports are supposed to be used in time of war to transport troops to the battle front. They did not use these transports in time of war. They used the privately owned vessels.

Now, I am in favor of the merchant marine. I am in favor of doing anything which will build it up and follow the example of England and the other nations which have their merchant marine ready to convert into transports when needed, to carry troops wherever and whenever they want to carry them.

I believe we should have a merchant marine and then in time of war turn the ships into a transport system and turn them over for the use of the Army and Navy.

This is one proposition on which I am in favor of the proposal of the Economy Committee. I am also going to be in favor of consolidation of the Army and the Navy and stopping this jealousy between admirals and generals, and let one man run the war when war comes along, so that the private and the gob will not have to go out and be killed while some general or some admiral is trying to find out whether the Navy should go out or whether the Army should go out. I am going to favor that consolidation. I believe it will save $100,000,000. That is real economy from my point of view.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it so happened on yesterday that the Quartermaster Corps opened bids for the Army Transport Service next year. One of the companies that bid was a certain fruit company. In their bid they stated that all their steamers were under foreign flags except one tanker.

If the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is not adopted, so far as the Army is concerned, it will be necessary to increase the Army appropriation for the next year $3,000,000. For instance, the lowest bid received to transport a trooper from San Francisco to Honolulu is $65. The cost by Army transport is $15. From San Francisco to China the lowest commercial rate to the Army is $105. The cost by Army transport is $35. The commercial rate to the Army from New York to Panama is $45; the Army transport rate is $14. From New York to San Francisco the commercial rate to the Army is $75; the rate by Army transport is $40. From San Francisco to Honolulu the commercial rate to the Army is $65 as against a cost by Army transport of $15.

In other words, gentlemen, by adopting the Barbour amendment we can save $3,000,000. Not only that, but the hospital facilities on the Army transports are far better than they are on commercial boats. For instance, on the Chateau-Thierry, on which many of you have been, there is a 30-bed hospital, including mental ward, 10 bens; isolation ward, 4 beds. It has an operating room with all modern equipment, a dispensary stocked with medicines, one Army surgeon, and five hospital attendants. The hospital is located on the boat deck, with deck space available for convalescent patients.

On commercial boats the hospital facilities usually consist of four beds with no provision at all for restraining mental patients, with one doctor and no hospital attendants; and all these men would be down in the steerage. I beg of you gentlemen to support the Barbour amendment.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The bill provides that the Secretary of War shall dispose of all property in addition to the ships used in connection with the transport service. Can the gentleman give us an idea of some of the other property that would be disposed of?

Mr. JAMES. That would mean that in the ports of New York and San Francisco the docks and piers that should serve the Government in case of war for the transport service would be turned over to somebody else.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; it would mean, among other things, depots that cost $72,405,480.10, and the whole matter should be stricken out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the very purpose, I will say to the gentleman, of this whole provision in this bill.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. The gentleman is not quoting the bill correctly. We have amended that provision in the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am absolving the gentleman from Alabama of having anything to do with this, but I am saying to the gentleman from Michigan that this whole thing was started by a bunch of rats in New York who want to sell these piers, and somebody fell for it, and this amendment is here. Does the gentleman from California know anything about that?

Mr. FREE. What?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You heard me.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. LEA. What would happen if these millions of dollars' worth of ships and piers in the possession of the War Department were thrown on the market at this time?

Mr. JAMES. We could not get any market for them at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY: Page 20, line 6, after the word "continuance," insert "The term 'property' as used in this section shall not be considered to include the docks, piers, warehouses, wharves, and terminal equipment and other rights transferred to the Shipping Board by the President under authority of section 17 of the merchant marine act, 1920."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, first I want to thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], the chairman of the committee, for the consideration he gave me in eliminating the joker in section 308, which I will not designate as a steal, because I do not want to reflect upon the integrity of any Member of this House; but I do say that if that joker had been inserted by a lobbyist that lobbyist, on a 10 per cent commission, would have received from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 as his fee.

I was the first to reveal this joker to Mr. MCDUFFIE and to the War Department.

Col. Frederick H. Payne, Assistant Secretary of War, said that the main purpose of abolishing the Army Transport Service was to give private interests a chance to get these piers at a tremendous bargain and Government sacrifice in New York City, in Boston, in San Francisco, in Manila, and Honolulu. Colonel Payne said Al Capone never planned as big a steal nor a bolder job.

INVESTIGATE PRESENT LEASES

There may be something rotten in Denmark now in regard to the lease of these piers, but because of lack of time I can not go fully into that now.

AN OMNIBUS GRAB BAG

Gentlemen rise here and cry to high heaven to support this alleged economy bill. They blindly appeal to us as Republicans; they appeal to us as Democrats, and they cry to us as lovers of the flag to support this sacred cow.

What is an omnibus bill? It is nothing but some bad measures and some good measures thrown into a carry-all bill. The only way you can get support for the bad measures is to trade with a Member who wants to put his pet measure in. With regard to this particular economy bill, one member of the committee is interested in a tariff item in the Senate, and if he is promised support for that he consents to other measures in this bill. Another member is interested in a certain plan. If he gets that, he consents to much of the rest of the bill.

There are bad provisions in this bill and good measures. Let us weed out the bad and put through the good provisions.

THE JOKER DISCOVERED

I discovered this very vicious joker compelling the sale of piers and terminals, and my point was granted, and I want to compliment the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], who will soon offer an amendment to strike out this joker.

I insist, in view of remarks made during this debate, that Mr. MCDUFFIE is absolutely honorable and did everything possible to help kill this joker and protect the people's interest by rewriting the section and offering a committee amendment. The gentleman from Alabama said at first he did not think the language of section 308 meant what I charged, but then upon study he admitted it.

The War Department says that the sale of these piers, used in connection with those vessels—which would be thrown on the market at panic prices, at from 5 to 10 per cent of their value—would mean a loss of $100,000,000; in Brooklyn alone, $50,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS. The committee had an amendment curing that.

Mr. CLANCY. I just said that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I insist I am not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

HISTORY OF PRICELESS PIERS

Mr. CLANCY. The United States Government obtained four piers and the Brooklyn Army base at the time of the World War mainly through condemnation proceedings. I am informed the total cost was about eight millions of dollars, but these piers have become enormously valuable since, and are worth, according to the estimate of the War Department, over fifty millions of dollars.

They occupy a wonderful position in the greatest harbor in the world—New York Harbor. They have deep water, which some of the New York piers have not, and even as gigantic a ship as the Leviathan and also the biggest German ships can dock there.

They are not located up the river as many of the New York piers are, but are down the harbor considerably, and thus the tremendous traffic, particularly of the smaller boats and ferries, is avoided and the danger of collision is largely averted.

Moreover, these piers are singularly free of fog. Fog is prevalent in New York Harbor from time to time and causes delays which run into enormous financial losses through the inability to dock boats. Still further, fog is the chief cause of collisions in New York Harbor, which is very disastrous when they occur, because even if they do not cause the destruction of the ship they may cause such damage that the ship will have to go to dry dock and be laid up for a longer or a lesser period and thus prevent sailings. When a ship which is loaded with passengers and freight and is leaving the harbor for its voyage abroad suffers a collision, the result is particularly devastating, as it means a costly unloading of the cargo and passengers and the making of costly new arrangements.

PECULIAR GOVERNMENT LEASES

In 1921 the Shipping Board insisted upon getting piers 3 and 4 of the Brooklyn Army base transferred permanently. Piers 3 and 4 were loaned to the United States Shipping Board and they, in turn, leased them to the Atlantic Tidewater Terminals for a rental of 55 per cent of the gross receipts with $160,000 minimum. The Shipping Board obtains about $210,000 per year from Piers 3 and 4.

The Atlantic Tidewater Terminals Corporation leases Pier 3 to the Roosevelt, a purely American line, for about $250,000 to $300,000, which is my guess. They leased Pier 4 to the Steamship Terminal Operating Co., which is a Jarka interest, and who, in turn, lease it to the North German Lloyd Line for about $350,000 to $400,000 per year. Jarka was a former boss of stevedores for German lines in New York Harbor.

If the Shipping Board, which has all the facilities for handling leases, leased directly instead of through these sublessees, the United States Government would probably gain several hundred thousand dollars more per year.

From the above leases it is clear that the Atlantic Tidewater Terminal Corporation is making a large profit which the United States Government might make for itself through its ownership of the piers.

It is also probably that the Jarka company, known as the Steamship Terminal Operating Co., is making a large profit which should rightfully go into the United States Treasury. Why all this system of leases and subleases, when there is a large and capable Government division, known as the United States Shipping Board, which could handle these leases directly instead of peddling them out to persons who probably make a barrel of money out of the arrangement?

DEALING WITH FOREIGN LINES

Moreover, the United States Shipping Board was established to aid and develop the American merchant marine and to fight its bitter and unscrupulous competitors in the foreign merchant marine.

I know that the North German Lloyd Steamship Co. enjoys the very highest reputation, and I have never been informed that it indulged in sharp practices in its competition with American ships.

I am a member of the House Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee and know that all our efforts have been to build up the American merchant marine and gain our own ships as many advantages as possible.

Our committee established a ship-subsidy fund of about $250,000,000 to help build and maintain and operate American ships on the ocean, and we were very careful to write language in the legislation and guard the fund so that none of it should go into foreign boats or foreign lines or aid in the building of or operation of foreign lines.

Yet here we have at the United States Army base at Brooklyn a system of subleases whereby a foreign line uses our docks and bases. It is true it does so on a lease at a rental which is presumably high. Undoubtedly the foreign line is made to pay to the limit of the pound of flesh; but if the United States Government wishes to make that arrangement with the foreign line, why does it not do so directly, and why does it allow tens of thousands of dollars of that rental to fall into the hands of the Jarka interests and the Atlantic Tidewater Terminal Corporation?

As a member of the House Merchant Marine Committee, I am going to go further into this matter of leases, which has just been tipped off to me within the past few days.

RETAIN GOVERNMENT TRANSPORT LINES

I now take the position that we should kill all the provisions of this so-called economy bill which provide for the sale and junking of the Army, Navy, and Panama Transport Services.

From what I have said already, it is evident that there is enough indication of sharp practice and scandal to suspect the whole proposed destruction of the Army, Navy, and Panama Railroad transport services.

Proposals of abolishing these Government maritime services have been made time and again within the past 10 years.

They have been rejected by three Secretaries of War, three committees of Congress, by the chief coordinator, and by former President Coolidge.

These emphatic actions of honest and intelligent high officials of the Government should make us proceed very slowly to junk or sell these services now.

Only a few months ago we had to use transports to send troops to China. We have to use them very frequently to send troops to the Latin American countries when rebellions break out. We may have to use transports within a few weeks after they are sold or junked under this so-called economy bill.

It may be that the Panama Railroad transport service does compete with private industry, but that is true only to a slight extent.

I believe that the Army and Navy transport services do not compete seriously with private business and that they are engaged practically entirely in Federal Government business.

Therefore, I will vote for the Barbour amendment to strike out sections 308 to 313, inclusively, and this striking out will preserve the Army, Navy, and Panama Railroad transport services.

If the time has come to change our minds and abolish one or more of these services, then we should proceed through the regular congressional committees of the House covering these activities. We should hold hearings pro and con and arrive at a just and intelligent and economical and patriotic conclusion.

We can not arrive at such a conclusion in the terrific rush and hustle and bustle of consideration of this omnibus economy bill, which was made by logrolling and by trading good and bad measures.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that part of the section of the bill be read, the amendment on the Clerk's desk which the committee intends to ask be inserted in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment affecting this particular matter may be read by the Clerk for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, section 313:

Under sections 308 and 309, neither the Secretary of War nor the Secretary of the Navy shall sell or otherwise dispose of docks, yards, wharves, depots, terminals, or real estate in connection therewith, except that either may lease such properties for periods of not to exceed five years and at rentals which will provide a reasonable return on the cost thereof. The net proceeds from the sale or lease of property by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy under sections 308, 309, and this section shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that has just been read should completely satisfy the gentleman from Michigan and other Members with reference to the desire of the committee to protect the property of the United States. There is no desire upon the part of this committee to make any sacrifice by reason of doing away with the Transport Service, but I want to tell you why it should be done away with. We never had a transport service in this country until the Spanish-American War. We are the only country on the face of the earth that has one. It did not amount to a damn during the late war. There was but one vessel belonging to the Transport Service that went overseas, and it never came back. The transport service of every government is a part of the merchant marine, and we are derelict now because of the fact that we have not the character of transport service which we should have, and we should be building up our merchant marine so that we could have a proper transport service.

Remember that we are the only Nation on earth that has a transport service except the transport service that is given by reason of the fact of the merchant marine. That is true of England, France, and every first-class power on the face of the earth, and General MARTIN knows that.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman permit a statement?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We are the only Nation, too, that has prohibition, are we not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, yes; but that is aside from this question. The merchant marine of this country is being subsidized by the Government for the purpose of building up something that is worth while, yet we are putting the Government of the United States in competition with the merchant marine.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman used as a premise for abolishing the Army and Navy Transport Service the fact that we are the only Nation of the world that has that service. If we are going to follow the gentleman's same line of reasoning, since we are the only Nation in the world that has prohibition, does the gentleman say we should abolish prohibition?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Let us talk about the question that is before us. However, the gentleman from Wisconsin said he was put down in the hold. He was put down in the hold because of the fact, if it were a fact, that we did not have a merchant marine then. We did not have any, and it was to the shame of this Nation.

I want to say to you that the Army is trying to insist upon keeping this thing going in spite of the fact that they are losing more than $3,000,000 a year, and in doing that we are competing with merchant marine vessels of this country, which we are subsidizing. We are paying out money on the one hand to the merchant marine of this country and then putting Government vessels in competition with them.

I will tell you what ought to be done. We ought to have a merchant marine in this country that would be prepared, in case of war, to take care of our soldiers as they should be, and will be, if you will do away with this transport system.

In case of war the Army would not have the transport business for one single minute. It would go to the Navy, and the Navy is in favor of doing away with this system now. They know they can not keep up a transport service that is worthy of the name. Of the 13 transports we had during the war, only one went over and that was loaded with marines. They thought if anybody was going to get lost, lose the marines. The transport never came back. They made a nice refrigerating arrangement out of it.

True to form, the Army, after it gets hold of a thing, never wants to give it up, and they have the temerity to say to us that they can operate this business cheaper than private companies. They also tell us they have a manufacturing establishment in Philadelphia making clothes, and they say they can make clothes cheaper than the commercial people can do it. They have never surrendered a single thing and never will if they can help it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one-half minute so I may ask a question.

Mr. DYER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment because it is covered by the McDuffie amendment.

Mr. DYER. Is the McDuffie amendment pending?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The McDuffie amendment was read as a part of the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman gags every other Member of the House on this important matter and I shall have to gag him. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the committee amendment which has been read, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. TABER. I yield for that purpose, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, strike out section 313 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 313. Under sections 308 and 309 neither the Secretary of War nor the Secretary of the Navy shall sell or otherwise dispose of docks, yards, wharves, depots, terminals, or real estate in connection therewith, except that either may lease such properties for periods of not to exceed five years and at rentals which will provide a reasonable return on the cost thereof. The net proceeds from the sale or lease of property by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy under sections 308, 309, and this section shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this language is in the amendment, word for word, as it was offered the other day.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It was a part of the bill.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is a part of the amendment and it so appears in the RECORD, word for word.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I agree with the gentleman, but some gentleman here thought it was not a part of the bill.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The bill is not the amendment. The amendment is the language which the gentleman offered the other day.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair inform the committee whether we are considering the bill as printed and known as H. R. 11597, or the bill that was submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] for consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. We are considering the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama on behalf of the Economy Committee. There are some differences between it and the printed bill to which the gentleman has referred.

The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Do I understand we are considering a bill which is on the desk which contains something that is not in the copies of the bill that the Members have?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So far as these particular provisions are concerned, that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the full text of the bill we are now considering as offered by the committee was printed in full in the RECORD upon the day it was offered. The Chair is further informed that there are some minor differences between that and the original bill that was reported by the committee.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment to offer to this part of the bill just referred to by the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] to offer an amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman from New York yield so that I may submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. TABER. I yield, if it does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. TABER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 22, line 21, after the word "cost," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "said contracts to continue over a period of at least 10 years"; on page 22, line 25, strike out the figure "25" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "65"; and after the word "the" insert the word "now."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of putting the Government in business, but there are some major activities, such as the Post Office, the Panama Canal, the Army and the Navy, that the Government alone is in a position to carry on.

It was found necessary when the Panama Canal was built that we should take over and operate steamships to carry the men to their work and back to this country, and also the materials that were used in the canal.

The Panama Railroad was taken over by the Government of the United States at the time the canal was built. This operation of the steamships is used primarily for carrying material and supplies down to the canal and carrying the employees to the canal, and the Panama Railroad, and back and forth, at a rate approximately of $30 each way for each employee and members of their families, and freight at 75 per cent of the published tariffs.

If they were required to pay more than that most of them on the wages they receive could not afford to make the trip, and could not keep in shape.

In this bill it is proposed that these employees who now go back and forth in decent quarters, travel in the steerage at rates which are more than double and in some cases more than treble what they are now paying.

It provides in the bill that in the first place they shall get 25 per cent less than the published rate, but it does not say "now published rates." So I have offered an amendment which will make it "now published rates."

I have offered an amendment that if this language goes into effect, the rate for passengers shall be 65 per cent below the published rate, because that is what they are now getting from the Panama Railroad.

The Panama Railroad in normal times is operated without a loss of any kind. In 1928 and 1929 it showed a profit. We are able to operate it at a profit in normal times. There was a loss of $245,000 in 1931, when everybody suffered a loss.

The Government is paying mail subsidies of seven and a half million dollars in 1932 and $9,000,000 for 1933 for ships operating to the Canal Zone. The Panama Railroad does not carry any first-class mail.

These subsidy vessels would not take second and third class mail, but load their junk on the Panama Railroad Co. steamships.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. LEA. Three thousand employees annually go back and forth from the United States to the Isthmus.

Mr. TABER. Three thousand nine hundred.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry: A few moments ago the membership of the House were advised that we were considering the economy bill effecting a consolidation, and then we were advised that a certain provision did not appear in the bill but was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I rise to ascertain when we may expect a consolidation of the two bills?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves that all debate on this section——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CLANCY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLANCY. The chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. McDUFFIE, and a member of the committee, Mr. RAMSEYER, say that the McDuffie amendment was incorporated in the bill as printed. That is not the fact. I am informed by the Clerk that it is due to an error of the Government Printing Office. It does not appear in the bill, and I want to preserve the McDuffie amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I say again, as I said before, that if there is anything that should be in this bill that is not in it to protect the Government, I want it put there. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] as to whether the Government is operating these transports at a profit, every figure offered by their own department shows that they are operating at a loss. I will show you how they show a profit. It is like a father who buys a farm for his son, paying for the farm, paying for all of the necessary equipment to run it, and then expecting the boy to show a profit at the end of the year without paying for anything connected with the conduct of the farm. Let me impress this thing upon your minds. A great deal of talk has been had, and will be had before we get through, I expect, to the effect that it will cost more by private concerns to bring the men and women who are working down there up to the United States. They come from there to the United States upon the theory that because of the climate they must come back here at least once every two years.

Under the bill the commercial establishments must furnish a rate 25 per cent lower than they furnish to the ordinary public, and in addition to that we are paying these people who are down there at the present time 25 per cent more than we will be paying them here for doing the same kind of work, upon the theory that we are expecting them to come back here every two years. That is to say, suppose a person in this country is getting $1,200 a year for a certain service. Down there he will be getting $1,600 for the same service. The additional $400 is to make it possible for him to come back here and pay whatever it may cost him to get back.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The theory of the $400 extra pay on a $1,200 service is not to bring them back, but the theory is that they are down there from a Temperate Zone in a Tropical Zone where their health is impaired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will read the debates at the time, he will find that the reason for the additional 25 per cent is because the man who is down there is expected to come back here, and it was given him for that purpose. There is nothing of the kind mentioned by the gentleman from New York. We have been talking long and loud about getting your Government out of business, and yet we are keeping it in business all of the while. Each one of these transports is competing with commercial business, which we have been trying to build up by the establishment of an American merchant marine.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HART. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to get out of the cotton and the grain business also?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I expect so; but we have this thing before us now, and let us get out of one thing at a time. I will go with the gentleman on that proposition, but because we are not out of that cotton and grain business is no reason why we should not get out of this.

Mr. SWING. What I am concerned about is in time of a national crisis, such as happened at Shanghai, how would we function under this bill about getting our troops from Manila to Shanghai in a hurry?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Fortunately for the United States Government, a transport was there at that time. If it had not been there, one of the Dollar Lines would have taken the soldiers the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the Taber amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 65, noes 30.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. McDUFFIE and Mr. TABER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LaGUARDIA: Section 313, after the word "lease," insert "at public auction to the highest bidder," and at the end of the section insert, "Provided, That there shall be no renewal clause or right in said lease."

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. As far as I am concerned, and I am not prepared to speak authentically for the whole Economy Committee, I think the members of the committee are agreeable to the amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman understand that the McDuffie amendment which was presented a little while ago and adopted is now in the bill or is not in the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the most vicious thing in this bill is now before us. Mr. Chairman, I have used some pretty harsh language, and I do not modify it or take back a single word, but in all fairness I want to say that as soon as the committee discovered that there was danger of something having been put over on them they prepared this amendment, which is now part of the bill, and it is due to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] to say that. But the House ought to know that there has been some pretty slimy lobbying going on.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, I have absolved the gentleman.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want the gentleman to absolve the committee.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will not absolve any of the lobbying that has been going on.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. This whole transport elimination was inspired by some shipping interests in New York City. They were to divide the spoils—one-half the outfit to get the freight and the passenger services to Panama and Hawaii, and the other to take over the leases. There was a slimy lobbyist around the corridors of this building, reeking with liquor, and I know what offices he was in, and that resulted in this provision being put in the bill. If the provision stands, we are protected by the McDuffie amendment, with my amendment to it which simply provides that the property is to be leased at public auction and to the highest bidder, and that we are to have no renewal clause in the lease.

The gentleman must not forget that pier values in New York City run into millions and millions of dollars. The eyes of certain great shipping interests, who are now getting large subsidies from the United States Government, are on that property. They are not satisfied with getting the subsidies, but they want to take this valuable property and they want to get this Government business that the Panama Steamship Co. and the Army and Navy transport services are now operating at a great saving to the taxpayers. The Panama Steamship Co. is economically and efficiently managed, and some of these subsidized political ship companies could learn a great deal from the little Panama Steamship Co.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SWING. Why auction off these valuable vessels at a time when there is no market for them and nothing but the lowest possible bid can be received for them?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. We are not going to sell these properties at all. The amendment prevents that. If the sections are not voted out of the bill, the properties could only be leased, and at auction, and only for a short term. Of course, I hope to vote out all sections which would kill these splendid Government services.

Mr. SWING. Absolutely.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is my amendment accepted?

Mr. McDUFFIE. As far as I am concerned, there is no objection to the gentleman's amendment, but the gentleman has been pretty severe in his language with reference to this committee.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Not with reference to the gentleman.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want the gentleman to straighten himself out. If the gentleman is talking about any slimy lobbyist coming to me, I want to know it, and I want to know it right now.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I say they were around this building, and I will say I do not think the committee has any knowledge of what was being attempted in this provision of the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And the entire committee corrected it as soon as it was brought to their attention.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am giving you credit for it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And the committee never once thought that it had to do with anything except things other than real estate and depots.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman's amendment must be corrected in so far as he proposes to have——

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I do not think the Members of this House who are running this job ought to go down in the well of the House and talk among themselves without the balance of the House knowing what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's amendment proposes to insert a provision about public auction after the word "lease." The word "lease" occurs twice in the proposed section. I assume the gentleman refers to where it occurs first?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the amendment is modified accordingly?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am as much opposed to putting the Government in business as anybody in this House; but here is a proposition where the Government is not in competition with anybody. The Government is doing its own business. The fleet of the Panama Canal is just as essential to the operation of the canal as the canal itself. There are over 11,000 men in the Canal Zone. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who said we were giving them 20 per cent because they wanted to come home. That was not the theory for that additional money. I happened to have been chairman of the committee which authorized that increase. The increase was made on the theory that no man from this climate could go and live in the tropics without coming home at least once in two years to preserve his health.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; I can not. It is infinitely worse for the wives of the employees.

We have passed a separate retirement bill for those people, recognizing the fact that men who live in the Temperate Zone can not go to the tropics and perform service there and last as long as they would if they were performing service in the climate in which they were born. Now, if this provision is retained, it will impair the operation of the canal. It may be true, as the gentleman from Indiana said, although I have not the figures, as I did not realize it was coming up to-day, that ships of the Panama Canal are operated at a slight loss. That may be true; but the entire operation must be taken together—the canal, the railroad, and the ships. Aside from the depression in 1930 and 1931, the Panama Canal, taken as a whole, has paid the United States Government a profit.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. LEA. As I understand, the only large deficiency in the Panama Canal was last year, during the extreme depression.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. LEA. During the last 10 years the average deficiency has not been over $60,000; and if the employees paid only about half the fare that is charged by private ships, there would be no deficiency.

Mr. PARKER of New York. But let me impress upon the membership of the House, although I do not presume it will have any effect, that for the last 18 years I have been either chairman of the committee or a member of the subcommittee dealing with the Panama Canal, and this transportation service is just as essential to the operation of the canal as the canal itself.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Is not the real truth of this matter to get ahold of these docks more than anything else?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I am not accusing anybody of anything. I am stating the plain facts regarding the operation of the canal.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. But I am asking the question. Is that not the truth?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That I do not know.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Is it not a fact that for the past several years the Panama Railroad Co. has paid an annual dividend to the United States Treasury of 7 per cent on its capital stock?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is perfectly true.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And there have been no appropriations made by Congress for the operation of the railroad, the steamship line, or any of its subsidiaries?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on sections 308 to 313 close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman from Indiana has already spoken. They are gagging us. The gentleman has spoken three or four times. They are going to close debate in five minutes, and are going to give the "gaggers" the five minutes under their own motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Indiana has already spoken.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in speaking now——

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] has consumed the time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana can be recognized if he makes a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then that is my motion. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, 52 cities represented in Chicago within two weeks have asked this Congress to take the Government out of business, and the thing they emphasized more largely than anything else was this transport proposition. Every chamber of commerce in every State of the Union that has acted at all upon this question has asked us to do the same thing.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not yield.

Are we to be responsive to the will of the people, or are we simply to be subservient to the demands of the Army? I have been here for 18 years, and I am getting pretty tired of seeing the Army hold everything it has.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is out of order. The gentleman is not discussing his motion, which was to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, "Army" is the last word. Therefore the gentleman is in order.

Mr. SCHAFER. I would like to have a ruling from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Indiana is out of order. He is not discussing the motion under which he so adroitly obtained recognition for about the third time he has spoken on this section. His motion was to strike out the last word. The last word is "receipts." The gentleman is certainly speaking out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will proceed in order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then I am glad to proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. For just a question.

Mr. BLANTON. As the head of his party, can he not control one of his obstreperous Members over there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I admit that I can not control him. If you can, exercise your ability. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I can not yield.

Gentlemen, this Committee on Economy has spent eight weeks trying to save some money to the Government of the United States, and incidentally, trying to benefit the Government of the United States or those who make up the taxpayers of this country. The taxpayers of this country are asking you to take the Government out of this business, and we are the only government on the face of the earth that is in it.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HART. What about the Mississippi-Warrior service?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is just as bad as this, and the Government ought to be taken out of it.

It is said that the Government is making a profit, but that is by reason of the fact it does not count anything for capital investment, anything for wear and tear, anything for depreciation, anything for interest, anything for insurance; and that is what we are paying to-day to this transport service, in violation, if you, please, of every business principle on earth.

So there is no justification for keeping it, and, as I said before, we are the only nation that is keeping a transport service, and we are doing it in detriment, if you please, to the Army itself and to the Navy itself.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the abolishment of the Army and Navy transport system is so essentially necessary, why does the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War strongly oppose its abolition from the economy standpoint, from the national-defense standpoint, and from the standpoint of service to the red-blooded American enlisted men in their establishments?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I did not yield for a speech from the gentleman on the other side.

If you will examine the facts, this committee spent days and days in going into this thing, and the evidence shows that we are losing from one million to two and a half million dollars a year in the operation of this business in addition to having this concern in competition with the merchant marine of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted.

Mr. DAVIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to say anything upon this question, although I am very much interested.

I am very strongly in favor of economy. Governmental expenditures must be drastically reduced. I am in favor of goting much farther in many respects in effecting reductions in Government expenditures than this bill goes, although I wish to commend the Economy Committee for the arduous and splendid work it has done in many particulars.

However, the purpose and intention of this committee was to effect economies and not to act as a legislative committee otherwise. I object to some provisions that have been drafted into this bill, which are not in the interest of economy and which will not effect any savings but are purely legislative proposals, which certain interested parties have been seeking for years and years to get through, but which could not be enacted when presented before the committees and the Congress upon their merits. [Applause.]

The proposal to dispose of these Army and Navy transport services and to permit private ship lines to perform this service for the Government comes within that class. [Applause.] As already stated, lobbyists of certain shipping interests have been here industriously working in behalf of such legislation all this session.

They are not for the proposal from any standpoint of economy, but in order that private shipping lines may make a big profit off the Government in transporting the troops and supplies for the Government.

I want to say to you, in the light of 12 or 13 years' study of the subject from time to time, that the proposal to abolish the Army and Navy transport services is neither in the interest of economy nor efficiency, but just the reverse. Instead of effecting economy, in my opinion it would cost the Government $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 annually.

This is no new proposal. During the Taft administration private shipping interests attempted to have the Army and Navy transport services abolished, but President Taft and his Secretary of War recommended against it. Then, during the Wilson administration, the private shipping interests renewed their efforts, and President Wilson requested Secretary of War Newton D. Baker to investigate the subject, which he did and strongly recommended against the abolishment of the services, and President Wilson concurred in his conclusions.

I am advised that the Military Affairs and the Naval Affairs Committees have likewise investigated the subject and reached the same conclusion.

The Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries has had before it bills to abolish these services; this committee has conducted exhaustive hearings, heard everybody on both sides desiring to be heard, and in every instance since I have been a member of that committee, after the hearings before that committee, even the sponsor of the bills was not bold enough to ask that the bills be reported out of the committee. They just died of their own weight. The committee always reached the conclusion that it would not only make for inefficiency but would cost the Government a large amount to abolish these services and pay private lines for the transportation of our troops, supplies, and munitions to and from our various possessions.

I am not in favor of the Government engaging in business in competition with private business where it can be avoided. My position upon that is well known to you colleagues who have been sufficiently interested to note my position; but the Army and Navy transports do not engage in private business, and I want to say to you that the transport service is just as essential to our Army and Navy as are the war vessels. [Applause.]

During the last war there was infinitely more need for transports, and they were infinitely more valuable, than were the war vessels and rendered much greater service.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The facts are that in the last war we had but one transport of the Army that went across the ocean and it never came back.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman from Indiana has made several speeches and he and I do not agree upon the facts, much less upon our conclusions. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The information we have is that we had only one transport in the last war, that it went across the ocean and never came back. We also have information to the effect that we could not carry our soldiers on transports.

Mr. DAVIS. And what did we do? We had to go into the open market and pay five or ten times the value of the vessels in order to use them as transports. [Applause.]

It is true that we had but a few small transports when we became involved in the World War. The need of additional transports was so imperative for the transportation of our troops, munitions, and supplies that we had to quickly purchase and charter ships at exorbitant war prices.

During the World War, we paid out over $200,000,000 in charter hire of ships alone. We engaged in the most prodigious shipbuilding program in the history of the world. This program cost upwards of $4,000,000,000. We put into service 2,500 vessels.

That experience is all the more evidence why we should not dispose of the few Army and Navy transports we now have, which are no more than are needed in peace times, and which would certainly afford a nucleus if we should become involved in another war.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. Chairman, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I wish to call attention to the fact that the largest proportionate savings provided in the pending economy bill are those relating to the United States Shipping Board and Merchant Fleet Corporation, which specifically effect a saving for the next fiscal year of more than a third of the present expenses of these organizations and ship operations. As stated in the bill, this is represented by a reduction of $367,000 in salaries of personnel and in the reduction of the cost of the expenses of operation of Shipping Board services of $1,938,240, making a total of $2,305,240. The bill reduces by $367,000 the amount already carried in the independent offices appropriation bill for personnel for the next fiscal year, and provides for the transfer from the operating funds of the Fleet Corporation to the General Treasury the sum of $1,938,240.

The bill further provides for the reduction of the members of the Shipping Board from seven to four and the reduction of their salaries from $12,000 to $10,000, and further provides that no official or employee of either the Shipping Board or Fleet Corporation shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000.

As chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, I called into conference the chairman of the Shipping Board and the president of the Merchant Fleet Corporation and explained to them that the financial situation was such that drastic economies should be effected in their organizations, and that they knew best where such economies could be effected with the least injury to the public service.

These officials agreed to cooperate and upon my request prepared and submitted to me specific details as to where and how such economies could be effected. Thereupon I called the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries into session and invited the entire membership of the Shipping Board and the officials of the Merchant Fleet Corporation to be present. I laid the plans before the meeting, and they were readily approved by the committee. The members of the Shipping Board and the president of the Fleet Corporation were called upon individually, and they all approved the plans. The members of the Shipping Board also agreed to and did adopt a formal resolution approving the plans and agreeing to carry them into effect.

Then we laid the plans before the Economy Committee, which readily approved the same, and the chairman of the Economy Committee requested me to draft the appropriate provisions, which was done under the direction of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], and myself, all members of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. Such provisions were incorporated in the economy bill as drafted and as heretofore explained and have been adopted by the House without any change whatever.

I here insert two letters received by me from the chairman of the Shipping Board, explaining these reductions and economies, and advising of the formal approval thereof by the Shipping Board.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, April 16, 1932.

Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on
Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN DAVIS: In accordance with understanding had between the board and your committee at conference yesterday, there is transmitted herewith statement of economies which have been authorized and are now in process of accomplishment by the Merchant Fleet Corporation indicating total savings of $1,938,240, together with supporting data, as requested by the committee.

In addition to the above the Shipping Board can effect the following economies in connection with personnel of the Fleet Corporation assigned to the board, as follows:

Bureau of Research	$30,000
Bureau of Law	103,000
Bureau of Traffic	9,000
Bureau of Construction	5,000
Bureau of Operations	20,000
	167,000
Engineering experiment-research fund	200,000
Total savings on behalf of Shipping Board	367,000

The grand total of indicated savings which can be effected between the Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board is $2,305,240.

This represents the amount which under present conditions can be saved, with a prospect that additional savings can be effected when a further survey may be had of possibilities under the reduced operating force.

This report has not been formally agreed to by the board, but such action will be had on Monday, the 18th instant.

Very truly yours,

T. V. O'CONNOR, Chairman.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, April 18, 1932.

Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on
Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN DAVIS: Referring to letter of April 16, 1932, regarding economies which can be effected by the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation, I beg to advise you that the board this morning ratified and approved the letter as delivered to you.

The board particularly desires to call your attention to an additional figure of saving which can be effected if all the lines are sold amounting to $443,945. * * *

This additional figure does not include the advantage to the Treasury of the 25 per cent down payment in cash which would accrue from the sale of the lines the first year. This cash would amount to $1,255,477.56.

To summarize: Whereas our letter of April 16 shows total savings by the board and Fleet Corporation of $2,305,240, we may go farther and say that there will be in addition to that $443,945 and $1,255,477.56, making a total figure of economy through the retrenchment and sales program submitted of $4,004,662.56.

Very truly yours,

T. V. O'CONNOR, Chairman.

Under this plan the board consolidated the four shipping services operating out of the Gulf of Mexico, and they already have a satisfactory offer for the purchase of the entire consolidated service, which the Shipping Board has approved. The bidders have filed a certified check as evidence of good faith. If this sale is effected, the second letter from the chairman of the Shipping Board explains the large additional savings which would be effected.

In addition, the plans embrace a consolidation of two services operating out of Hampton Roads, and the Shipping Board has received a satisfactory offer for this consolidated service. This would result in a large additional saving.

This would only leave two Shipping Board services, for one of which the Shipping Board has a tentative offer.

The sale of these services will result in a large additional reduction of personnel and other expenses, besides those specifically provided in the economy bill, and should result in the liquidation of the Merchant Fleet Corporation and further reduction in the personnel of the Shipping Board.

May I be permitted to suggest that if all the congressional committees had proceeded in like manner with respect to the activities of the Government over which they had legislative supervision, very large savings could have been effected?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCDUFFIE) there were—ayes 175, noes 32.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 14, line 11, strike out all of section 301.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I trust the members of the committee will give careful consideration to the amendment I have just offered, because this is a very vital section of this bill.

This bill is designed to save money. This section, on the contrary, is a very extravagant and pernicious section. It permits the departments to obtain 15 per cent of the annual appropriation and spend it without Congress having any voice in the matter; in other words, you permit the various departments to have 15 per cent of the amount of money we appropriate and spend it as they see fit instead of spending it in the way Congress has directed.

Just to show you what would happen, a few days ago we appropriated $325,000,000 for the support of the Navy. Under this provision the Navy Department can take $48,000,000 of that amount and spend it as it sees fit, upon the approval of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, the gentleman has not read the section or he would not make such a statement.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If the gentleman will read the provision he will see that I am absolutely correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It may be transferred from one activity to another activity in the same department.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And it can not be over 15 per cent that is transferred from one bureau to another; but my statement is absolutely correct that Congress loses control of 15 per cent of the amount of money appropriated to each and every department of this Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman know that in the Department of Agriculture this provision has been permanent law for years and that that department can make such transfers?

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS. It never has been the rule in the Department of Agriculture except within bureaus in the department. They can not transfer from one bureau to another.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is absolutely correct. If this provision stays in the bill, instead of being in the interest of economy, it is in the interest of extravagance, because no longer will Congress have the right to itemize the appropriations and say how each and every dollar shall be spent. We will confer upon these departments this right, which is a thing that the Navy Department and the War Department and every other department have been seeking for years—to say how the money shall be allocated instead of having it allocated by the Congress.

Has the time now come when Congress no longer wants to exercise its right and its jurisdiction with respect to the distribution of the various appropriations? This is not in the interest of economy, but is in the interest of extravagance.

Let me illustrate further. We itemize every dollar that is spent in the Navy and we say that so much money can be used to buy automobiles. If, in the judgment of the Navy Department, it is desired to do so, under this provision they could take 15 per cent of the $48,000,000 and buy such automobiles as they saw fit to purchase.

We appropriate in the Department of Agriculture bill $125,000,000 for good roads. If, in the judgment of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and the department, it is proper, they can take a portion of 15 per cent of the total amount appropriated to the department for good roads and use it to kill grasshoppers or the boll weevil or the Mediterranean fruit fly or for any other purpose it may see fit.

Let me say further that this is what the departments have been fighting for year in and year out. They want to have the right to say how the money shall be distributed instead of submitting an itemized statement to Congress each year.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is it not true, also, that if a bureau or department should have a surplus, instead of that money being covered into the Treasury it would be immediately transferred to some other bureau and used?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Why, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman who has just left the floor has misunderstood the purport of section 301. It is true that it permits a 15 per cent shift in appropriations, but the gentleman overlooks the fact that not more than 15 per cent can be added to any one appropriation. It would be an impossible thing to take $48,000,000, for instance, from any given appropriation and add the $48,000,000 to any other appropriation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, it is limited to 15 per cent as between one item and another, but the $48,000,000 would be 15 per cent of the total appropriation, and that amount is lost control of by Congress and they could distribute the $48,000,000 as they saw fit.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman knows very well that nothing of the sort will be done. No Cabinet officer would take $40,000,000 from any one appropriation and give it to any one bureau, or, for that matter, to groups of them. That is pure nonsense, because you can only add 15 per cent to any one bureau, and there is no place where you could put $48,000,000. The gentleman also said that they could take that money and buy automobiles, if they wanted to do so. That statement is absurd on its face.

I wish you would look at the situation as it actually exists. The Senate has made a 10 per cent flat reduction in many appropriations, and has done so more or less blindly. This has left some bureaus practically high and dry. It has left other bureaus with more money than is indispensably necessary for them to function. The only way the matter can be handled and adjusted upon a sensible and businesslike basis is to allow some transfer of appropriations, and leave it in the discretion of the head of the department. Unless this is done, we are going to have chaos in the departments and the efficiency of the Government service will be destroyed.

This provision applies only to 1933. It is an effort to correct, so far as possible, a situation which has been created by indiscriminate cuts without much reference to the bureaus effected or the merit of the respective activities. There must be some method adopted that will permit some of the most essential activities to function. If cuts have been made injudiciously or if they have been made without reference to merit or if they have been made blindly, manifestly there must be in the hands of some one some degree of discretion to transfer these appropriations from one bureau to another to temporarily tide them over until Congress can remedy the situation. There is not any danger that a large amount of money is going to be transferred from one bureau to another.

You have had such a provision with respect to the Agricultural Department for years. The Secretary of Agriculture has been able to transfer 10 per cent of an appropriation from one activity to another. It has never been charged that this privilege has been abused. It has worked admirably, and been in the interest of efficiency and good government and resulted in a better balancing of the activities of the department. I should not favor the provision under ordinary circumstances, and the only reason it is proposed for 1933 is because of the character of the cuts made.

Of course, every provision of this kind, giving discretion to a department, is susceptible of some abuse, but if we are not able to trust anybody in the matter of appropriations, in view of the cut made at the other end of the Capitol, you are going to have plenty of trouble in all of the departments.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have felt very keenly about this section, because I know that the departments of this Government for many years have wanted to do this very thing—to secure interchangeable control of at least a portion of the appropriation.

While I regret to differ with the Economy Committee, I am opposed to letting the heads of departments and the Director of the Budget legislate with reference to these appropriations. [Applause.] We carried on the war involving billions of dollars, and no such interchangeability was undertaken or placed into law. There was a bill introduced during the World War seeking to put several billion dollars under the control of the War Department, but Congress overwhelmingly voted it down and made appropriations from time to time in the usual form.

Now, gentlemen, let me tell you, as the gentleman from Georgia says, this means extravagance. It does not mean economy.

Let me tell you what could happen. We have an appropriation of $108,000,000 for public buildings in the Treasury Department. Congress cut the Coast Guard appropriation a million dollars from the Budget estimate against the recommendation of the Treasury Department. If this section becomes law the department could take from your public building fund and practically restore that cut in the Coast Guard appropriation. That could be done by the head of the department, if approved by the Budget, who was frank enough to say a few days ago, "What is sacred about a new post office in times like these?" This remark would indicate that there might not be much hesitation about transferring $16,000,000 from the public building appropriation to other Treasury Department purposes.

But that is not all. Congress has limited the amount for prohibition to something over $10,000,000 for the Department of Justice. If this provision is inserted the Department of Justice might take 15 per cent of other appropriations and increase the prohibition enforcement sum a million and a half dollars.

That is not all; in the Agriculture Department there is $109,000,000 for public roads, and if this provision becomes a law it might be possible for the Secretary of Agriculture to take $15,000,000 and distribute that among other operations in that department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman read the section and tell us how he can take $15,000,000 and transfer it to other activities?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from Iowa understands that as well as I do. Of course he is not going to take $15,000,000 in one operation, but he could increase appropriations of every bureau in his department and use the 15 per cent of that appropriation, and that is just what I object to.

Congress is in session, and, gentlemen, you should keep your hands on these appropriations. I do not want to see the public-building fund used for any purpose other than what Congress intended. [Applause.]

That is not all. Take the War Department. The War Department appropriation bill has not yet been reported. The Budget estimate for rivers and harbors amounts to $60,000,000. Flood control amounts to $32,000,000. If this provision becomes the law, the Secretary of War, if he sees fit, can take either all or a portion of 15 per cent of $92,000,000 and distribute it among other bureaus in his department, and it is that to which I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This Economy Committee has had its ups and downs for eight weeks. It started out with one chairman and ended up with another. Still the words ring in my ears as we left the Economy Committee the last time. This member says, "I do not like that" and another member says, "I do not like that," but the way it sounds in my ears now is that there was a general understanding that we would come in here and try to stand together.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman will not accuse me of entering into any such agreement.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not quoting anybody and I am accusing the gentleman of nothing.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to deny that I promised the committee or anybody else that I would stand for this thing. I do not propose to be put in that attitude before the House.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not saying that the gentleman did. If he says that he did not, that settles it with me.

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. RAMSEYER. All right; but this committee has been kicked around by different groups. Now the committee gets a kick from one of its own members. There is no use of our getting excited about this. Evidently the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] does not know that we are in an emergency. The country is in a condition such as it never faced before. This is emergency legislation; it is for one year only; and it is to enable the departments to function, to meet situations such as was created in the Interior Department appropriations when this Congress cut the appropriation flat 10 per cent without designating what activities in that department were to be affected, and unless the heads of departments, with the approval of the Director of the Budget, have a right to make some transfers, some functions of government may break down altogether. This does not authorize the heads of departments to take 15 per cent off one appropriation and add it to another, but it does provide that no appropriation can be increased over 15 per cent. You can not take 15 per cent from public roads or rivers and harbors. What can be done is, that if some appropriations are deficient, you can take from others; but the increase of the particular appropriation can not be over 15 per cent. That is a distinction that is important and which the gentleman from Tennessee overlooks. Let us read this language which the motion seeks to strike and get it right. There is no use of getting excited about this. We ought to look at this calmly and remember that we are confronted by a serious situation. We are cutting here and cutting there, right and left, and going at it blindly in some cases.

All this does is for the fiscal year 1933 to authorize the heads of departments, with the approval of the Director of the Budget, to make transfers from one appropriation to another appropriation in the same department, but to any particular appropriation to which the transfer is made, it can not be increased over 15 per cent. Oh, yes; the gentleman from Tennessee, a great dry advocate, had to throw out a sop to you wets warning you that you better look out or else they would increase the appropriation to enforce the prohibition law.

Mr. SCHAFER rose.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; I do not yield. Let me read:

To any other appropriation or appropriations under the same department or establishment, but no appropriation shall be increased more than 15 per cent by such transfers.

The inference from the gentleman's speech was that here is the public-roads appropriation—$100,000,000 or more—and that you could take away $15,000,000 and put it somewhere else. That is not in this provision at all. The committee, out of an abundance of caution, wrote in a proviso requiring that—

A statement of all of the transfers of appropriations made hereunder shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1935, and a statement of all transfers of appropriations made hereunder up to the time of the submission of the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1934, and all contemplated transfers during the remainder of the fiscal year 1933 shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1934.

That is, that between the 1st of July and the 1st of November of this year it must show in the Budget how much has been transferred and what they contemplate transferring during the remainder of the fiscal year. That keeps the Congress advised. This is simply to meet an emergency situation, and it is for one year only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLINS) there were—ayes 107, noes 26.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 14, line 15, after the word "Columbia," insert "the appropriation bill for the support of which may not have been sent to conference between the Senate and the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona) there were—ayes 77, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAMNECK: Page 17, line 16, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 304. No moneys heretofore appropriated for State aid shall be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, except the amount appropriated for vocational education."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane. The section is out. There is nothing left of the bill about State aid of any kind.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair thinks that, this being under the miscellaneous provisions, the amendment would be germane. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWING: Page 15, lines 3, 4, and 5, strike out section 302.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SWING. I do not understand that debate has been closed upon the entire title.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in error.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONERGAN: Page 24, line 24, add a new section:

"* * * Provided, That in the consolidation or merging of Shipping Board activities, employees originally appointed as a result of civil-service examination, or by transfer from such civil-service status in another department, be given preference for retention in the consolidated or merged board or bureau over employees who have no such civil-service status."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOWMAN: Page 28, line 23, strike out all of section 322.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 17, line 24, after the word "Government," insert "and $225,000 for farmers' bulletins."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane. It is increasing an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is germane. The situation is entirely different from the former amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The Chair thinks the gentleman has now brought the same within the rules of germaneness. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUCHANAN) there were ayes 62 and noes 78.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. WILLIAMSON as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 112 and noes 100.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 26, line 4, strike out all of subsection (i) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation is hereby abolished effective June 30, 1932, and its activities, authority, powers, and operating funds are hereby transferred to the United States Shipping Board, except $1,938,240 of such operating funds which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. This is simply an amendment transferring the Merchant Fleet Corporation to the Shipping Board, and it is clear there is no apparent saving on the face of it, and no economies are involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the committee for two minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 14, line 12, insert a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 301. Not to exceed 15 per cent of any appropriation for the Interior Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, may be transferred, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to any other appropriation or appropriations under the same department or establishment, but no appropriation shall be increased more than 15 per cent by such transfers: Provided, That a statement of all transfers of appropriations made hereunder shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1935, and a statement of all transfers of appropriations made hereunder up to the time of the submission of the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1934, and all contemplated transfers during the remainder of the fiscal year 1933, shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1934."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSEYER) there were ayes 54 and noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IV—REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 401. In order to further reduce expenditures and increase efficiency in government it is declared to be the policy of Congress—

(a) to group, coordinate, and consolidate executive and administrative agencies of the Government, as nearly as may be, according to major purposes;

(b) to reduce the number of such agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head;

(c) to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort; and

(d) to segregate regulatory agencies and functions from those of an administrative and executive character.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 402. When used in this title—

(1) The term "executive agency" means any commission, board, bureau, division, service, or office in the executive branch of the Government, but does not include the executive departments mentioned in title 5, section 1, United States Code.

(2) The term "independent executive agency" means any executive agency not under the jurisdiction or control of any executive department.

POWER OF PRESIDENT

SEC. 403. For the purpose of carrying out the policy of Congress as declared in section 401 of this title, the President is authorized by Executive order—

(1) to transfer the whole or any part of any independent executive agency, and/or the functions thereof, to the jurisdiction and control of an executive department or another independent executive agency;

(2) to transfer the whole or any part of any executive agency, and/or the functions thereof, from the jurisdiction and control of one executive department to the jurisdiction and control of another executive department; or

(3) to consolidate or redistribute the functions vested in any executive department or in the executive agencies included in any executive department.

SEC. 404. The President's order directing any transfer or consolidation under the provisions of this title shall also designate the records, property (including office equipment), personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations to be transferred.

SAVING PROVISIONS

SEC. 405. (a) All orders, rules, regulations, permits, or other privileges made, issued, or granted by or in respect of any executive agency or function transferred or consolidated with any other executive agency or function under the provisions of this title, and in effect at the time of the transfer or consolidation, shall continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer or consolidation had not occurred, until modified, superseded, or repealed.

(b) No suit, action, or other proceeding lawfully commenced by or against the head of any department or executive agency or other officer of the United States, in his official capacity or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of any transfer of authority, powers, and duties from one officer or executive agency of the Government to another under the provisions of this title, but the court, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after such transfer takes effect, showing a necessity for a survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against the head of the department or executive agency or other officer of the United States to whom the authority, powers, and duties are transferred.

(c) All laws relating to any executive agency or function transferred or consolidated with any other executive agency or function under the provisions of this title shall, in so far as such laws are not inapplicable, remain in full force and effect, and shall be administered by the head of the executive agency to which the transfer is made or with which the consolidation is effected.

STATUTORY AGENCIES

SEC. 406. Whenever, in carrying out the provisions of this title, the President concludes that any executive department or agency created by statute should be abolished and the functions thereof transferred to another executive department or agency or eliminated entirely the authority granted in this title shall not apply, and he shall report his conclusions to Congress, with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

DISAPPROVAL OF EXECUTIVE ORDER

SEC. 407. Whenever the President makes an Executive order under the provisions of this title, such Executive order shall be transmitted to the Congress while in session and shall not become effective until after the expiration of 60 calendar days after such transmission: Provided, That if Congress shall adjourn before the expiration of 60 calendar days from the date of such transmission such Executive order shall not become effective until after the expiration of 60 calendar days from the opening day of the next succeeding regular or special session: Provided further, That if either branch of Congress within such 60 calendar days shall pass a resolution disapproving of such Executive order, or any part thereof, such Executive order shall become null and void to the extent of such disapproval.

REPORT TO CONGRESS

SEC. 408. The President shall report specially to Congress at the beginning of each regular session any action taken under the provisions of this title, with the reasons therefor.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill. Can the chairman advise the House what he intends to do with respect to a recess or an adjournment this evening?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I want to do what the House wishes to do. [Applause.] I have already learned my lesson along that line. I should like very much to see the committee work until 5 o'clock and then recess until 7.30 this evening.

Mr. BACHMANN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that many of the Members on this side would like to recess from 5 to 7.30.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: On page 31, line 15, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and," and insert a new paragraph after line 15, as follows:

"4. To designate and fix the name and functions of any consolidated activity or executive agency, and the title, powers, and duties of its executive head."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has the approval of the Committee on Economy. It is simply a perfecting amendment offered for the purpose of making sure that the President will have the authority to carry out the purposes of the bill. The amendment gives him authority which he probably has now, but which ought to be made certain, namely, that the President, in consolidating activities, has the right to give the consolidated activity a name, and to designate the title, powers, and duties of the person chosen to administer its functions. That is the only purpose of it. It should be adopted in order to complete the section.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think that power is already granted in the language as it is, but if the gentleman prefers having additional language to that effect I am not going to object to it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. His power now is implied. This amendment makes it clear that he has the necessary authority to carry out what the committee has in mind.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. As I understand the amendment, it authorizes the President to fix the duties of any new combination agency that he may create. It might mean an additional expense rather than an economy.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is the gentleman familiar with the language of the amendment?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Clerk read the language of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. JONES. In other words, he can fix all the powers, duties, and obligations of the new agency. He can transfer any executive or nonstatutory agency or division, or group them under a new head, and then clothe them with additional powers.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES. He can. Of course, it might be subject to disapproval.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has not read the title, or he would not make that statement.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; I have. The gentleman evidently has not thoroughly considered the broad powers of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota, especially in connection with the terms already in the bill.

The President may make an Executive order under section 407. Sixty days elapse. It then becomes effective. Then under the added power of the amendment under consideration added powers may be given.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will read the definitions under section 402, I am sure that what the amendment comprehends will be clear in his mind.

Mr. JONES. I do not agree with the gentleman from South Dakota. It seems to me it gives blanket authority when read in connection with the other provisions of the title.

I think an effort should be made to eliminate rather than to create new agencies.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is what we tell him to do.

Mr. JONES. I offered an amendment a while ago to authorize the abolishment of the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation. They have two organizations, a United States Shipping Board and an Emergency Fleet Corporation. Why have both? Why not eliminate one? They have a division of law and a bureau of law. You might as well have a bureau of fisheries and a bureau of fish. Those things should be consolidated.

The portion of this section which authorizes consolidation and elimination is all right; but if I read the amendment correctly in connection with previous and subsequent language, you would authorize him to create a bureau and to transfer the duties, fix the powers and obligations of that bureau. Is not that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I think the gentleman is wrong. I call his attention to the language of section 406, which expressly prohibits him from abolishing or transferring the functions of any executive agency or department which has been created by law.

Mr. JONES. Where does the gentleman find that language?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That language is in section 406, on page 33. I think the gentleman is in error. If he will read section 406, he will find that whenever, in the opinion of the President, an executive department should be abolished or the functions of that department or agency should be transferred, when that department or agency has been created by statute he can do nothing more——

Mr. JONES. That is limited to statutory agencies. That does not apply at all to the different agencies that may be created under the other definitions and which may not be statutory agencies in any sense. Section 407 transfers legislative power by virtue of the lapse of time. Then linked with this amendment, I fear that additional duties may be conferred.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES) there were—ayes 93, noes 14.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: On page 33, line 15, after the word "transmission," insert a comma and "unless Congress shall sooner approve of such Executive order or orders by concurrent resolution, in which case said order or orders shall become effective as of the date of the adoption of the resolution."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Before the gentleman proceeds, may I state that that is not a committee amendment. The committee objects to that amendment very seriously.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I did not announce that it was a committee amendment. The Chair may have assumed it was such from the fact that I am a member of the committee. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of the amendment, I may say to the gentleman from Alabama, if he will listen to me, is to make it possible for an Executive order to become effective if both Houses shall pass a resolution approving of the Executive order. Suppose the President sends an Executive order reorganizing a certain department. Why should not the Senate and House be permitted to pass a concurrent resolution approving that Executive order so that it may go into effect as of the date when Congress passes the resolution? Under these circumstances there is no reason why it should wait for a period of 60 days if Congress should determine otherwise.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If I caught the reading of the amendment, it provides for a joint resolution to veto the action of the President?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Not a joint resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is what I understood from the reading of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It does not change the language in any way. If the gentleman will look at the point where the amendment comes in——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. This does not in any way limit or affect the two provisos. The House may disapprove the order, in which case it becomes null and void. The only effect is to permit affirmative action by both Houses, if they see fit to take such action, so that the order may go into effect at once without being delayed for a period of 60 days.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The provision in line 15, after "provided," remains unchanged. This is only for the purpose of expediting the order if a joint resolution approving it passes both Houses. Of course, if one House rejects it, that ends the matter.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Could not the order go into effect without waiting the entire 60 days? The gentleman's idea is that it can not be effected until after the expiration of 60 days.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, no.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If both Houses say they want it to go into effect prior to the expiration of 60 days, this amendment permits it to do so?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; and that is all it does.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLADAY: Page 33, strike out section 406 and section 407.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion these two sections are the most important sections in this bill. A great many of the proposed economies we have considered so far in this bill are temporary propositions and are effective for only one year. The sections dealing with the consolidation of bureaus and departments provide for a permanent program; and if any economies are effected, they will continue in the years to come.

On the 19th of February of this year I introduced a resolution giving the President of the United States the power to abolish, combine, and consolidate commissions, boards, departments, bureaus, and divisions of the National Government. The provisions of my resolution are included in the bill we are now considering. The economies possible under the terms of my resolution, as contained in this bill, are curtailed by the two sections my amendment would strike out, as these two sections require that any consolidations that the President may make must come back for the approval of Congress.

During the three days this bill has been under consideration I have wondered how many Members of this House are actually in favor of effecting permanent economies in government. The President, according to newspaper reports, has expressed a desire for authority to consolidate certain departments, claiming that if he had such authority, economies in government could be effected.

I am in favor, in the face of the emergency that confronts this country, of giving such authority to the President.

Under the provisions of the two sections struck out by my amendment the President has but little authority except upon the approval of Congress. Whatever he does must come back here for the approval of the Congress, and has there ever been a better illustration of the difficulty of Congress agreeing upon economies than we have witnessed during the last three days? There is a great difference of opinion in this House, and this is the trouble we have with every effort we make to effect economies. There is a difference of opinion, a difference of interests; and the net result is that on account of those conditions, we are not able to effect the economies we should.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman would not deny Congress the right to assert such differences and have the membership of this House pass upon them?

Mr. HOLADAY. In the interest of economy, I would.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment is to strike out sections 406 and 407 of Title IV.

Section 406 provides that whenever, in the discretion of the President, an executive department or an agency should be abolished or the functions of such a department or agency, created by statute, should be transferred to some other department or agency, the President shall submit his recommendations to the Congress for approval or disapproval by the Congress.

There is a reason for having inserted this language in the amendment. This reason is that Congress can not delegate to the President authority to abolish an executive department or an agency created by statute. To do so would be to delegate to the President authority to legislate. This clearly can not be done under the Constitution.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think that power is given to him in section 407, where you are legislating by negation?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; the gentleman is in error. Section 406 applies only to those departments or agencies which have been created by statute, with respect to which the President thinks certain things should be done.

Section 407 has to do with the elimination or transfer of bureaus or agencies which have not been created by statute. With respect to them it provides that the President may, by Executive order, arrange for their elimination or their transfer, and it provides further, that such Executive order shall not become effective unless Congress, within a period shorter than 60 days, shall have positively approved of such Executive order, or unless within 60 days either House of Congress shall have vetoed or disapproved the Executive order.

The provisions of section 407 are confined only to those executive departments and agencies which have not been created by statute.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. What has the gentleman to say about delegating the power of Congress, in section 604, page 44, where you delegate the power not to the President, but to a Cabinet officer to consolidate, eliminate, restrict, and create?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. If the gentleman will wait until we consider title 6, I will discuss that question with him.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman in favor of giving this superman this broad power?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I decline to yield further.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is not the distinction this, that the bill provides for reorganization by Congress, whereas the other is vesting power in the Executive to reorganize?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Certainly. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois in effect would delegate to the President legislative powers which can not be delegated by Congress. In the second place, it would deny to Congress the right to disapprove any Executive order the President might issue with respect to a bureau or agency not created by statute. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment, and I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I agree fully with the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] that, if we ever have a reorganization of the various departments of the Government really worth while, we must give the President the necessary authority to do the job. The debate on this bill and the action of the House during the last few days are evidence anew of the correctness of that statement. I did not intend, however, to take the floor to discuss his amendment, and would not have done so, except for the positive statement by the gentleman from Arizona that such authority could not be delegated to the President. He made the statement so positively that it seemed to me that it ought not to go unchallenged. I admit that it is a disputed question. My understanding is, and I have given the subject some study, that all lawyers do not agree about it, but some very good lawyers say the passage of legislation giving the President the power to reorganize and consolidate the departments and activities of the Government as contemplated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] would be in itself sufficient repeal or amendment of the statutes which created those activities to authorize or permit the President to make the consolidations and reorganizations without reference to any further action by the Congress.

I merely rose for the purpose of making this statement so that the RECORD would show that there is more uncertainty about the question than the rather definite statement of the gentleman from Arizona would indicate. At most it can only be said that it is a disputed question.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Since the committee appears to have given this matter much consideration and is in agreement as to their title, surely the gentleman is not desirous of raising a controversy about a legal question that might be argued from different viewpoints.

Mr. MAPES. I am not trying to raise any question, but I do not want the RECORD to show that a statement that a disputed question was really not disputed was allowed to go unchallenged. I tried to interrupt the gentleman from Arizona while he was speaking to raise the question, but did not succeed.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I assume the gentleman would concede that there is hardly any legal question that has not two sides.

Mr. MAPES. Oh, I do not want to go into any fine hair-splitting discussion of this matter. I am not now discussing the policy of giving the President such authority. I may add, however, that eight years ago the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce investigated the matter and rendered an opinion that the President could be given this authority.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I did not undertake to make a positive statement.

I was simply giving what seemed to me to be the opinion of the Economy Committee.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If Congress created these departments in the first instance, why should Congress absolutely surrender the right to have any views in respect to their policy?

Mr. MAPES. As a matter of policy the gentleman is entitled to that opinion, but I say that the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce eight years ago rendered an opinion that Congress could delegate this power to the President.

While I am on my feet I should like to add that I think this title as reported by the committee is a distinct step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. The elimination of the two sections, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, would improve it greatly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this title close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. This proposition is very important as well as interesting, particularly in these times when there is a tendency on the part of parliamentary government to delegate powers to the executive. I believe that Title IV is as far as we can safely go under our form of government, if Congress is to retain the powers and rights and prerogatives specifically given to it under the Constitution. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] to strike out these two provisions would be an absolute delegation of legislative power. I do not say that such a delegation would be abused, but I do say that it would be a most unsafe precedent to establish. I have consistently resisted the delegation of legislative powers to the Executive. Under Title IV, as it now stands, all it does is suggest to the President to make specific recommendations, and he can do that now. It is then up to Congress to act, if it cares to do so. The only change—and I do not like it, although it is in the bill—is that either branch of Congress can veto or reject the President's recommendations in 60 days. If we fail to do that, then the President may put the changes into effect. As far as I am concerned, being a fundamentalist and very conservative in my belief in and attitude toward the Constitution, I would not even go that far, because I believe in our representative form of government; I believe in parliamentary government. I prefer the procedure under existing law that Congress act on its own initiative or on recommendation of the President, and that until Congress does legislate affirmatively, no law is enacted.

Sometimes our form of government is cumbersome, sometimes it is costly, but it is representative government, and the price of popular government must be paid. I think it would be most unwise at this time to strike out section 407 particularly, and give this blanket authority to the President. I would not give that to any executive.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and an authority on the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. From the gentleman's investigation of the change in governmental structure, have not these changes arisen usually when people have acted in crises like this, or under stress have violated the basic laws of government?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Always; and always to their regret and own destruction. We learned in our study of law that hard cases should not be permitted to make bad law. Do not permit bad conditions to destroy good government! This is what Congress will do if we sit idly by and say that we are helpless, that we can not bring reorganization about, and therefore here must give blanket authority and legislative powers to the Executive. It is not the personality of the Executive that enters into it. It is a violent change and such a surrender that we are not justified in sanctioning. That is why I do not like section 106 of the bill, that permits the Secretary of the Treasury to receive from constitutional officers a refund of part of their salaries in place of a reduction, which the Constitution specifically prohibits. That is bad. I wanted to move to strike that out, but I was foreclosed. We should not do indirectly that which the Constitution says we can not do directly. We should not do by coercion or by shaming or coaxing that which the Constitution says we can not do by legislation. I believe section 106 is highly improper, and I am confident it will be stricken from the bill before the bill finally passes both Houses of Congress.

For the same reasons I can not favor any bill or part of a bill which would delegate legislative powers to the Executive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out sections 406 and 407.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a separate vote on sections 406 and 407.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for a division of the question. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to strike out section 406.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment to strike out section 407.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN: On page 30, line 16, add a new subsection, as follows:

"Subsection (e). That each Saturday of each week of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, is hereby declared to be a legal public holiday, to the same extent and in the same manner as Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th of July, and labor's holiday are now made by law public holidays."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order, that the amendment is not germane to the section or to the title.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the section applies to a declaration of policy. Certainly a declaration for a 5-day week can be construed properly as a declaration of policy. It is in line with the desires of the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As a matter of information, before we leave this title, I am still somewhat bothered about the question raised awhile ago. If I understand it aright, the President may recommend changes in statutory agencies, or he may make absolute orders changing nonstatutory agencies, or consolidating them. That, of course, is subject to the approval of Congress. One is a recommendation to Congress and the other becomes effective if Congress fails to act. The question I wanted to ask some member of the committee to answer is whether under the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] to authorize the President to designate the power and authority of any of these consolidated agencies, the President may not, after these have been created, then confer any power that he sees fit on that agency. In other words, suppose that under the nonstatutory agency the President should create a consolidated agency, or should consolidate two agencies, then, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota, he may thereafter confer any power or authority that he desires upon that agency. I think if the gentleman will read the amendment, he will see it provides that the President may fix the power, authority, and duty.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Under section 407 there is an abdication and delegation of power to the President of the United States to legislate, and if section 407 becomes law it will be the first time in the history of the Congress that such power was ever given to any President of the United States.

Mr. JONES. It is in connection with section 407 that I raise the question. He is given the authority; and then, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota, the President may clothe that agency with any power he sees fit.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The amendment, in my judgment, does not give the President any authority which does not already exist.

Mr. JONES. Why did he offer it, then? He offered it under the powers of the President.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No. Under this bill he can take two similar agencies, whether they be in one department or whether in two separate departments, and group them together under one head. In other words, the work and functions of two separate agencies, two similar agencies, can be put together under one head.

Mr. JONES. And then he may clothe them with any power he sees fit, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, these are administrative bureaus, in any event.

Mr. JONES. They may even become statutory bureaus. After they have been changed they are changed. They may become statutory or at least legalized bureaus—legalized by inaction of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No, no. Under section 406 he can not change the function of a statutory bureau.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. If he consolidates two agencies, he could confer any power that is conferred upon those agencies, and which those agencies enjoy, but he could not go outside and import new powers.

Mr. JONES. Well, he can, under the amendment. If not, then the amendment means nothing.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think so. It will be confined to the range of powers that those agents have.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman may be right were it not for the amendment just adopted, but it makes changes in the meaning of the existing provisions when read in connection with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE V—PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

CREATION AND ORGANIZATION

SEC. 501. There is hereby created at the seat of Government an establishment to be known as the Public Works Administration. There shall be at the head of such administration an officer to be known as the Administrator of Public Works, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall hold his office for the term of six years. Such administrator shall receive a salary of $10,000 per year, payable monthly, and under the direction of the President shall have the control and management of the various bureaus, agencies, activities, and services that the President may under this title transfer to and consolidate in the Public Works Administration.

CONSOLIDATION OF PUBLIC WORKS BY PRESIDENT

SEC. 502. (a) The President is authorized, by Executive order, to transfer to the Public Works Administration, and to consolidate and coordinate therein, the whole or any part of all bureaus, agencies, offices, activities, and services, whether now existing in any executive department, independent establishment, or as an independent activity, having to do or that are concerned with the architectural, engineering, surveying, designing, drafting, construction, and/or purchasing activities of the Government relating to public works, and/or that are engaged in the making of plans, specifications, contracts, and/or the supervision of public construction, and the transfer of any activity to the Public Works Administration shall carry with it such property, fixtures, records, and files as may be necessary to the proper functioning of such activity under the administrator, but no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize any transfer, consolidation, coordination, or change in the duties and responsibilities of the Chief of Engineers, or of the Corps of Engineers, or of the officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, with respect to rivers and harbors, navigation, flood control, and other civil functions and activities, all of which shall remain as now provided for by existing law.

(b) The Administrator of Public Works shall utilize the services of the Corps of Engineers, or the officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, whenever and wherever practicable in all other public works, construction, and activities. The Secretary of War, upon the request of the Administrator of Public Works, may continue, as under existing law, to detail officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army for duty in such other public works, construction, and activities, to the end that the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army and the officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army may be used whenever practicable in such other public works, construction, and activities, and when so detailed with the consent of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall be under the supervision and direction of the Administrator of Public Works.

(c) The Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department shall remain as now provided by existing law, and no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize any transfer, consolidation, coordination, or change in the duties and responsibilities of the said bureau and the chief thereof, or the officers and engineers therein. The Secretary of the Navy, upon the request of the Administrator of Public Works, may detail officers and engineers of such bureau for other duties in such public works, construction, and activities; and the Administrator of Public Works shall utilize the services of such officers and engineers whenever practicable; and when so detailed with the consent of the Secretary of the Navy the said officers and engineers shall be under the supervision and direction of the Administrator of Public Works.

(d) All officers of the United States Army and/or Navy detailed as aforesaid to serve in the Public Works Administration shall retain their military and naval rank and succession and receive the compensation, commutation, and emoluments provided by law in the case of Army and/or naval officers of the same rank not detached from the regular service; and such payments shall be made out of funds appropriated for use of the Public Works Administration.

(e) All strictly military, naval, and national-defense construction, improvement, maintenance, and administration shall be and remain in the Army and Navy under the Secretary of War and under the Secretary of the Navy, as now provided by existing law.

(f) The provisions contained in this title shall not apply to the power and authority now vested in the Architect of the Capitol and the United States Supreme Court Building Commission.

(g) All authority, power, and duties now vested by law in the head of any executive department, independent establishment, or office in and over any bureau, agency, office, officers, or branch of the public service, or in respect of any function or service transferred to the Public Works Administration under this title, or in or over any contract or business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, shall be vested in and exercised and performed by the administrator.

(h) All valid contracts and agreements entered into by any bureau, agency, office, officer, or branch of the public service, and in force at the time of transfer to the Public Works Administration, shall be assumed and carried out by the administrator.

(i) Under the direction of the President, the Administrator of Public Works shall have the power, by order or regulation, to consolidate, eliminate, or redistribute the functions of the bureaus, offices, agencies, activities, and services transferred, under the provisions of this title, to the Public Works Administration and to create new ones therein, and, by rules and regulations not inconsistent with law, shall fix the functions thereof and the duties and powers of their respective executive heads.

(j) No consolidation, elimination, redistribution, or coordination of the bureaus, offices, agencies, activities, or parts or functions thereof, as provided by this title, shall be effected, and no new ones shall be created under the authority of this title unless such action shall either in itself or in relation to the entire Public Works Administration be clearly productive of economy in public expenditures.

(k) Whenever any Executive order of the President or any order or regulation of the administrator is issued under this section, the President shall thereupon transmit to the Senate and House of Representatives a copy of such order or regulation, except that if the Congress is not in session at the time of such issuance, then the copy of the order or regulation shall be transmitted at the commencement of the next regular or special session of the Congress. Unless an act disapproving the order or regulation issued is enacted within 60 calendar days after the receipt of the copy of the order or regulation by both Houses, the order or regulation issued shall take effect on the day following the expiration of such 60-day period. If the session during which the copy of the order or regulation is received terminates in less than 60 days after the receipt of the copy by both Houses, an act disapproving the order or regulation may be enacted at any time within 60 calendar days after the commencement of the next regular or special session of Congress; but if such an act is not enacted, such order or regulation shall take effect on the day following the expiration of such 60-day period.

APPOINTMENT OF EMPLOYEES

SEC. 503. (a) The Administrator of Public Works may appoint, in accordance with the provisions of the civil service laws, from time to time such assistants, architects, engineers, and experts in design and drafting as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

(b) The personnel on duty at the time of the transfer of any bureau, agency, office, activity, or service shall be transferred to and given appointment in the Public Works Administration, subject to such change in designation and organization and reduction in personnel, salary, classification, or otherwise, as the administrator may deem necessary.

(c) Such of the employees as have a civil-service status at the time of transfer shall retain that status. The salaries of such employees shall be fixed in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, ch. 13; U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, ch. 13).

EXISTING LAW AND REGULATIONS UNCHANGED

SEC. 504. (a) All laws relating to such bureaus, agencies, offices, activities, and services as are transferred to the Public Works Administration, so far as the same are applicable, shall remain in full force and effect, except as herein modified, and shall be administered by the administrator.

(b) All orders, rules, and regulations in effect with respect to any activity at the time it is transferred shall continue in force until modified, superseded, or repealed by the administrator.

(c) All unexpended appropriations in respect of any bureau, agency, office, activity, or service transferred to the Public Works Administration shall be as available for expenditure by the Public Works Administration as though said administration had been originally named in the law authorizing such appropriations.

SERVICES FOR OTHER DEPARTMENTS

SEC. 505. (a) Whenever any executive department, independent establishment, or other agency or activity of the Government shall be in need of any service or matter coming within the purview of the functions of the Public Works Administration, such department, establishment, agency, or activity shall make appropriate request in writing to the Administrator of Public Works, who shall forthwith place his administration at the service of the department, establishment, agency, or activity making the request.

(b) All estimates for public work and construction coming within the purview of the Public Works Administration at the time such estimates are made shall be made by the administrator and all appropriations for public work and construction shall be made directly to the administration: Provided, That said administrator shall make a book charge against the executive department, independent establishment, or agency of the Government covering the cost of any services, public work, or construction performed for such department, establishment, or agency. The amount thereof shall be reported promptly to the department, establishment, or agency for whom services, public work, or construction has been done, and such department, establishment, or agency shall enter the cost of such services, public work, or construction upon its books and the amount of such cost shall be treated as a part of its expenditures in making its annual report to the President and/or the Congress.

MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 506. (a) Quarters for the Public Works Administration shall be provided by the Public Buildings Commission.

(b) It shall be the duty of the administrator to standardize designs, plans, and specifications, so far as practicable and desirable, with a view to effecting the utmost economy consistent with suitable construction.

(c) The administrator, at the close of each fiscal year, shall make a report in writing to the Congress, which shall be printed. Such report (1) shall give an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and the administration, and shall state for what purpose and on whose account expenditures have been made; (2) shall describe in detail what has been done under section 502 of this title, and shall insert a chart showing the set-up of his administration; and (3) shall make such recommendations with respect to legislation and other matters as to him shall seem appropriate.

(d) The Administrator of Public Works is authorized to make such rules and regulations, in accordance with law, as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this title into full force and effect.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against all of Title V, which seeks to create an entirely new department of government; that it exceeds the authority that was given the Committee on Economy; that the Committee on Economy had no authority whatever to propose to create such a new administration of government.

I want to call attention to the fact that if this Title V is passed in this bill it will be organic law that will authorize whatever personnel that may be required, new personnel. That may be 2,500 new employees, or 5,000 or 10,000 extra employees, and at whatever salary the administration sees fit to grant them, because there is no limitation whatever in this committee proposal. We are for abolishing bureaus and are not for creating new ones.

I call attention to the fact that this proposal to create an entirely new Administration of Public Works is different entirely from the title which seeks to consolidate departments. For instance, the title which consolidates the War Department and the Navy Department shows on its face that it effects an economy. It consolidates two departments. This effects economy on its face, and is clearly within the purview and authority of the Committee on Economy. I am heartily in favor of that proposal, for it will save $100,000,000 a year, but this is a proposition that undoubtedly will cost the taxpayers of this Nation much money. This provision of the bill does not abolish all of the bureaus that are supposed to be taken over by this Administration of Public Works. It leaves many of them still functioning, and this will be a duplication of effort and of expense and an increase in high-salaried employees, something that we have been trying to stop.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Just what is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. That this provision exceeds the authority that this House gave the Economy Committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman read the rule under which this amendment is offered?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; of course; but I do not remember its exact provisions. And I have read the resolution that authorized the creation of the Economy Committee, which is the fundamental law under which the committee acts, and that did not authorize the creation of any new bureaus.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was not the question that I asked the gentleman. Being somewhat familiar with the rule, I will state to the gentleman that the rule under which we are operating specifically gives to this committee the authority to offer this amendment despite any of the regular rules of the House with reference to germaneness. What has the gentleman got to say to that?

Mr. BLANTON. I believe that is a sockdolager. I had overlooked that, so I withdraw the point of order. But we ought not to permit the creation of this new department of Government, and we ought to vote it out of the bill when we reach the proper stage to do that.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 35, line 23, after the word "practicable," insert "to assist in an advisory or supervisory capacity."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of most of the provisions contained in this bill with reference to the Public Works Administration. My sole purpose in offering this amendment is to safeguard labor. The language in the bill at this point reads:

> The Administrator of Public Works shall utilize the services of the Corps of Engineers or the officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army whenever and wherever practicable in all other public works, construction, and activities.

Under this language it might be possible to delegate the Corps of Army Engineers to build a post office in your home town and thus put labor out of work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, I need not tell the gentleman I am in sympathy with his amendment, but I would suggest that we had better strike out all of section (b).

Mr. CONNERY. I am willing to have the Army engineers work in an advisory capacity.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But what happens to our architects and our engineers? That is their profession, they are organized, and they cooperate with labor and labor gets a squarer deal from them than they do from these Army or Navy engineers.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is correct. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by moving to strike out all of paragraph (b) beginning in line 20, page 35, and running to line 11 on page 36.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CONNERY. I have brought my idea before the committee. I do not want the Government to come into competition with private contractors or private architects. Especially I do not want the Government to come in competition with our workers. I am particularly interested in the workers and that was the main purpose for offering my amendment. There is a provision in this bill which takes care of flood control and dredging through the Army engineers. We are not interfering with that, but I do not want Army engineers to erect buildings that would be erected by private architects, laborers, and mechanics.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. At the present time they let outside contracts 25 per cent above the Army engineers. They do that now, and you have your own architects here who are building the post offices for the Government.

Mr. CONNERY. I understand that, and the gentleman can see what I am after.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I understand what the gentleman is attempting to do.

Mr. CONNERY. It is to prevent these Army engineers and Navy engineers from coming into competition with private engineers and architects, especially labor.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension as to the number of Army engineers engaged in civilian work. There are only 137 engaged in rivers and harbors work, while there are over 1,000 civilian engineers employed all the time. The number of Army engineers now engaged is very small.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, why the necessity for this section?

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to lines 16 to 25, on page 36. There the same provision is made for the Navy.

Mr. CONNERY. I understand, and I had in mind offering an amendment covering the language on that page also. Mr. Chairman, my sole idea is to protect labor. I offer this amendment at the request of the members of the American Federation of Labor, and I hope the committee will adopt it.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. What is the phrase the gentleman uses?

Mr. CONNERY. "To assist in an advisory and supervisory capacity."

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman wants to prevent the use of enlisted men in construction work?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; in the construction of post-office buildings, and buildings of that kind.

Mr. ARENTZ. Then why does not the gentleman specifically provide for that?

Mr. CONNERY. That is what my amendment provides. I want to prevent the use of enlisted men in the construction of post-office buildings, because we must remember enlisted men were used in the construction of barracks. That is my idea.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is unduly alarmed.

Mr. CONNERY. I hope I am; but I would like to make sure that labor is protected in this provision.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I shall try to make clear, if I can, just exactly what subsection (b) does. The rivers and harbors work is excluded entirely from this bill. The only purpose of subsection (b) is to permit, at the request of the administrator of public works, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy to detail such engineers of the Army and of the Navy as the administrator of public works desires for his purposes in doing a certain kind of construction. The committee thought that in some cases it might be desirable to use these Army engineers in the construction of dams and possibly in the construction of roads, which are going into the Public Works Administration in all probability. If the administrator desires to use Army engineers in that capacity he can request the Secretary of War to detail those engineers to the Public Works Administrator. While so detailed they are under the Administrator of Public Works, but subject to recall by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy at any time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is this language as to public works identical with the public works bill reported by the almost unanimous vote of the Expenditures Committee?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not think there is any change in the bill whatever. I think the gentleman will find it identical with the bill which the committee reported out.

Mr. SCHAFER. We ought to be positive that it is the same if we are going to take any responsibility for voting in favor of the provision because our committee reported it out.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is identically the same bill as the one reported by the Committee on Expenditures.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the perfecting amendments put in the bill in executive sessions of the Expenditures Committee are in this public-works section of this bill?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are all in Title V of the economy bill which we are now considering.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. With respect to the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], is it not true that neither this subparagraph nor the next has anything at all to do with the actual construction work; that is done by contract, and this provision will not interfere with such construction?

Mr. CONNERY. It can do it under the language here.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. All public buildings are let to contract, and after they are let to contract the contractors furnish the usual service of architects and everything else connected with actual construction. That is not interfered with. With the smaller buildings, such as post offices, the plans and specifications are made in the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and construction let out to bids.

Mr. CONNERY. Under this language they will not be compelled to let it out to contract. They can do it, if they wish, with Army engineers.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Of course, and in the Bureau of Reclamation, for instance, the Government now does a large part of its own construction in certain cases. If they desire they could call in Army engineers to aid them in such construction work, but there is nothing in the bill that indicates or proposes, much less requires, the Government to do its own construction.

Mr. CONNERY. But the language refers to the Corps of Engineers. I am not worrying about the officers, I am thinking of the men in the corps. If you put in the words "in a supervisory capacity" then you confine it to the officers.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I have no particular objection to that, but, of course, the officers of the Corps of Engineers are the only ones who can be detailed for work in the public-works administration as the language stands.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. The first part of this provision is mandatory and not permissive.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; and from my standpoint is objectionable. I think the word should be "may" in place of "shall" in line 20, on page 35.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 23, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this title do now close.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: On page 35, line 12, strike out the word "act" and insert in lieu thereof the word "title," and on page 36, line 13, strike out the word "act" and insert in lieu thereof the word "title."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN: On page 39, beginning in line 19, after the word "works," strike out the remainder of page 19 and all down to and including line 9, on page 40, and insert:

"Is hereby authorized and directed to employ by contract, and at the established rates of compensation, outside professional or technical service of competent persons, firms, or corporations, for the architectural and engineering designing and planning of such Federal buildings as are now or may in the future be placed under the jurisdiction of his department, without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, or to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

"That such employment shall be based at all times on the highest grounds of proven professional ability in order that our Federal architecture may truly represent our national genius and keep pace with the rapid development of the arts of architecture and engineering. Architects or engineers shall not be employed without prior submission to the Secretary of the Treasury of satisfactory evidence of their qualifications and experience.

"That wherever circumstances warrant, such services shall be contracted for by the employment of the ablest architects and engineers resident in the general sections of the country wherein such Federal buildings are to be erected.

"At the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the employment of outside architects or engineers may be omitted in connection with public buildings of a total cost for building and site of not more than $50,000.

"That all such individuals, firms, or corporations shall render their services subject to the approval and under the direction of the Administrator of Public Works, whose duty it shall be to act for the Government in all matters regarding sites, the allotment and subdivision of space, the control of technical detail, the letting of contracts, and the supervision of the erection of said Federal buildings"—

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. Instead of effecting economy the amendment would increase the cost of government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WOODRUM). Does the gentleman from Florida desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for the creation of a Department of Public Works, and this amendment to that provision of the bill provides that they are to have local architects and local engineers do the public work for the Government in Federal construction, rather than to let the bureaus do it. It is absolutely germane, because it qualifies the employment of those who will perform the work for the bureau or the new Department of Public Works. It is clearly in order. There is one place where the amendment reads "Secretary of the Treasury," when it should read "Administrator of Public Works." I shall offer that amendment to the amendment, which, of course, would be a perfecting amendment.

It is clearly in order, Mr. Chairman, because it is the same subject, it is the same purpose, but provides the manner in which the purpose of the bill shall be carried out. It provides for local engineers and local architects to be employed and directs that the Public Works Administrator shall employ them instead of continuing the bureaucracy that is now going on in this branch of the Government.

Mr. SWING. As I understand it, the gentleman is merely offering his bill which has heretofore been introduced.

Mr. GREEN. Yes. The bill that has been considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and indorsed by the architects' organization or institute. It is clearly in order and should be adopted.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What action was taken in the committee on the bill?

Mr. GREEN. The committee has held hearings and it has been referred to the Committee on Economy. It has not been acted upon by the committee—it is under consideration. It is indorsed by the profession, and I think is in order on this bill. Its adoption will bring about further economies in Federal construction, and will, I believe, bring better and more satisfactory Federal construction.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill creates a Public Works Administration, and was first reported by the Committee on Expenditures of the House, and, at the request of that committee, was included by the Committee on Economy in the omnibus bill.

The Committee on Expenditures deals with reorganization problems with a view to economy, very much as the Economy Committee. But the Committee on Expenditures has no jurisdiction to change existing law, except so far as is necessary to effectuate the consolidation or reorganization contemplated. The amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] contains legislation of substantive law that has nothing to do with reorganization. It provides that public work shall be let out by contract to private parties. The proposed amendment goes beyond the jurisdiction of the Expenditures Committee and also of the Economy Committee. In place of dealing with reorganization and consolidation, it provides a method for handling public construction and completely changes existing law.

I want to call attention to another point which makes it objectionable from the standpoint of germaneness. That is that it would result in unduly increasing the expense of Government contracts. You would be compelled to employ outside local architects, when we have architects in the Treasury Department.

It is well known that in all cases where private architects are used the expense is from two to three times as great as it is when the architects or engineers in the Government service are used. Clearly no economies appear on the face of the amendment, and unless economies would result it is not germane. It seems to me that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the proposed amendment strikes out subsection (b) in section 503, and subsection (c), which makes provision for the transfer of employees and bureaus which would be coordinated, and thereby let them out and increase the expense?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is true; and it substitutes in their places people outside of the civil service entirely.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the economy argument I want to say that it was developed in the hearing before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds upon this subject that this bill if put into effect would result in economy over the existing practices, because in obtaining local architects and local engineers, the employment of skilled ones only would be had and would result in economy.

It was developed in the hearings that frequently architects and engineers from a distance were employed to carry out work in other cities, and in that case the economies would not be effected, but involve great expenditure. Also the bureaus often have, I believe, more employees than are necessary. By letting local architects and engineers do the work each project would be separately carried out, and, of course, would be paid for individually, thus causing a saving over the annual employment plan now had by the departments.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The amendment to be germane would have to show on its face that it effects economies, and the gentleman will admit that it does nothing of the sort.

Mr. GREEN. I do not admit that, because it does effect economies. Within six weeks after this plan is put into effect there will be great economies in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret to differ with the gentleman from Florida upon the matter of economy. It is my privilege to be a member of the same committee which considered this bill, to which the gentleman from Florida refers, for two weeks. On the contrary, it showed definitely and positively that economy would not be effected.

Mr. GREEN. Did not all of the architects and engineers appearing before the committee contend that economies would be effected?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes; but to the contrary the Government officials contended there would be no economy.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, certainly; the Architect of the Treasury and his bureau employees said that economies would not be effected. The passage of the legislation would have abolished their positions and salaries, but the architects and engineers, not so fortunate as to be on the Federal pay roll, were unanimious in their contention that the legislation would bring about economy in Federal building.

It will bring about the ultimate use of local building material and local labor, and that is what we want and what the country needs. It will decentralize an existing Federal bureau and effect economy. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This title in the bill, Title V, deals with public-works administration, and the particular section to which the amendment is directed undertakes to set out a specific and definite method for the employment and use of existing governmental personnel in the interest of economy. The gentleman's amendment undertakes to set out an entirely different method. Any method which calls for the employment of outside personnel, however desirable it might be, how much it might appeal to us as an employment measure, the Chair is constrained to think is not germane to the section to which it is offered, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by Hon. MARY T. NORTON during Lucky Strike hour, National Broadcasting Co., station WRC, April 28, 1932:

ADDRESS OF HON. MARY T. NORTON, OF NEW JERSEY

I consider it an honor to address this vast unseen audience and desire to express appreciation to the sponsors of the Lucky Strike hour for affording me this privilege.

Congress has recently been working on a problem called "Balancing the Budget." This problem is very interesting to most of us who were members of the preceding Congress, when, under Republican leadership, nobody seemed especially interested in balancing anything—least of all the Budget. Appropriations were supported for every type of unnecessary expenditure from a $75,000 post office in a little town of a few thousand inhabitants to paying huge sums of money to certain wealthy individuals and corporations as rebates on taxes.

Now, suddenly, upon the Democrats assuming control of the House, we are told the Budget must be balanced. Nobody seems able to answer the question why it is so important to do this unpleasant task now in this most depressing of all depression years, when nobody seems able to balance their own Budget; but the fact is everybody around Capitol Hill seems to have become "Budget conscious" to so great an extent that it is now an epidemic.

I believe in balancing my own Budget so far as I can. Therefore, I am naturally in favor of doing the same thing for Uncle Sam—but there are certain lengths to which I would not go. One is to deprive a faithful employee, who has served me in the good years, the necessities of life, because of my lack of wisdom in not providing for the "rainy day" that always follows the day of sunshine. Only the most abject poverty could justify my doing so, and surely no real American believes that the Treasury of the United States can not sustain its obligations and provide decently for those faithful employees who, when prosperity and large salaries were the subjects discussed everywhere, stood four-square for their country by refusing to be stampeded into leaving their posts to go into industry.

During and subsequent to the war Federal employees did not receive a living wage. Not until 1923 were they granted any real increase. During all this time private industry not only increased salaries greatly but paid bonuses in stock and otherwise. It is true that industry has now decreased salaries, but the salaries now paid are greater than are those paid by the Government for the same type of work.

There is so much misinformation regarding Government salaries that I shall endeavor to present to my audience the true story. As a matter of fact, the average pay of all employees is about $1,440 per year. This is divided as follows: 17 per cent receive less than $1,000; 37 per cent less than $1,500; 57 per cent less than $2,000; 84.6 per cent less than $2,500; and 95 per cent less than $3,000 per year. There are a few $10,000 positions and a relatively small number from five to ten thousand.

From these figures you can readily understand that a straight cut of 11 per cent applied to all Government employees would save only about 5½ per cent of the national deficit.

This economy bill is now before the House. At last night's session, while failing in our efforts to defeat the proposed wage cut, we were successful in raising the exemption from $1,000 salaries to $2,500 salaries—taking care of the "little fellow." However, if a teller vote could be recorded, many of those who voted for the decrease would not have dared to do so.

Aside from the small amount of money this may bring to the Treasury, the loss in morale can not be estimated.

The President's plan for enforced furloughs in the Government service, which was defeated to-day in the House, certainly could not provide additional funds. If this were carried through, it would have meant the employment of from 25,000 to 30,000 additional people to substitute for regular employees. How on earth could this be considered economy? It would only cause confusion and inefficiency.

What we require to-day more than anything else is courage and confidence, and surely it does not take any amount of intelligence to understand that both will be destroyed by threatening the country with a general wage reduction. When people lose their courage, they lose their greatest asset; only God can help them then.

While on this subject of wage reduction, it may be well to call your attention to the fact that the pay roll of the recently appointed Reconstruction Finance Corporation—and, of course, this bureau is not under civil service, merely patronage appointments in the hands of the Republican administration—amounts to $500,000 a year, with Utah leading in the number of special considerations. Not much economy there! I might mention, too, that these salaries will not be interfered with in the event that the real employees of the Government suffer a decrease.

What a stupid method of bringing back prosperity. Curtailing the buying power of about 900,000 people. So much for that kind of economy.

Now let me say a word about the tax bill, which everybody seems to resent and we Democrats were obliged to pass in the House because of the reckless extravagance of 12 years of Republican rule or rather misrule.

We can not escape the conviction that conditions during the past two years have been such as would destroy the courage of even an extreme optimist; and we regret that the House has been obliged to pass a tax bill in order to keep our country solvent.

Those of us who voted for this bill were impelled to do so not only by the urgent necessity for such legislation but because we placed the welfare of the country above every other consideration. In doing so we did not believe that we would be called upon to tax our fellow countrymen to the limit and then vote a decrease in wages.

A much easier and less painful method of taxation was and is available, one that would undoubtedly have been acclaimed by the Nation as a whole. I refer to the bill which would alter the odious Volstead law, so as to permit the working people of this country to enjoy a harmless glass of beer and would at the same time bring millions of dollars to our Treasury in taxes.

May I say that the so-called bear raids we have been reading so much about in the press are peaceful Sunday-school picnics in comparison to raids that have been made upon our Treasury Department in the name of the ignoble experiment that has been misnamed prohibition. The law itself, thrust down the throats of a war-occupied electorate by an unholy alliance of reform racketeers and misguided impractical zealots, has done everything but prohibit. It has transformed a law-abiding citizenry to one that either scoffs at all law or regards violations thereof with indifference. It has dragged our once revered Federal courts from the pedestal of dignified tribunals of justice, respected and feared by the lawless, to the status of police courts. It has brought us the murderous gangster, the kidnapper, the extortionist, and the bootlegger. Its harvest has been one of constant seemingly never-ending evils. And its cost—not reckoned in moral liabilities—has been staggering.

My purpose in addressing you to-night is to beg you to think. The greatest trouble in our country to-day is that we have lost the art of thinking straight; of asking why; of placing responsibility where it belongs. In my opinion, the responsibility for the tax bill; the responsibility for being obliged to balance the Budget is clearly up to the Republican Party. That party holding the reins of Government during 12 years, the greater number of which witnessed our greatest prosperity; the party that spent nearly $62,000,000 a year to stimulate foreign trade with the net result that our foreign trade is exactly in the same position it was in 1914. What can justify this enormous expense to the taxpayer? What has become of the stimulation?

Sound foreign trade policies are essential to the economic welfare of every nation, but the maintenance of a bureau that has become a "white elephant" should cease, even though that bureau is the "fair-haired child" of President Hoover. The child has cost Mr. Average American too much money—and the building that cost our Government nearly $18,000,000 can not be justified when the employees in that building are now to be penalized because of this unnecessary extravagance.

The Democratic leadership in the House has a bare majority. It is trying to find a way out to serve the people of a distressed country. It has been obliged to put through legislation to help a bad economic condition. It has many handicaps because of the load of Republican debts which must be met, but it is not discouraged.

We appeal to the citizens of our beloved country to trust us, and we shall promise to find a way out of this endless misery. We want your confidence, your cooperation, and we ask you to elect a Congress this year that will give us a clear working majority and a President who will know how to lead.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of vocational education and to present a brief analysis of its uses by the State superintendent of public instruction of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, as my colloquy with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] indicates, I am opposed to section 303 which, beginning in 1934, reduces the Federal contribution for the development of vocational education under the several acts of Congress, and shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] to eliminate the section, which will have the effect of continuing the appropriations by the Federal Government for vocational education.

This is one of the most important contributions which the Federal Government makes in aid of the several States.

The most complete and careful analysis I have seen of the benefits of these appropriations is contained in a letter which I received from the State superintendent of public instructions of Oklahoma which, with the permission of the House, I attach hereto.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
Oklahoma City, April 16, 1932.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: The President and the House Economy Committee propose to suspend payment to the States for one year, under the terms of the Smith-Hughes and George-Reed Acts, for vocational education in agriculture, trades and industries, and home economics. Doubtless, you have been deluged with letters and telegrams protesting this move.

Do not confuse civilian rehabilitation, county agents, home demonstration agents, and 4-H club work with vocational education as provided under the Smith-Hughes and George-Reed Acts, These services are not affected by the proposal mentioned.

For the past 15 years the State of Oklahoma has made appropriations in good faith, expecting a permanent allotment annually from the funds created by these acts. The State appropriations are made on a cooperative basis; therefore the withdrawal of Federal funds for one year would destroy the program in this State.

The withdrawal of the Federal allotment to this State would mean—

In vocational agriculture—

(1) Depriving 5,000 adult farmers from receiving organized instruction in problems which confront them locally, including living-at-home readjustment.

(2) Depriving 4,000 farm boys from continuing their training in vocational agriculture, through whose efforts 68,000 acres of home farms were terraced.

(3) One hundred and thirty specially trained teachers of agriculture will be thrown into unemployment in this State.

(4) Would destroy 15 years of effort in developing an efficient training program for future farmers.

(5) Would deprive 130 local communities in this State of funds necessary to provide a systematic and efficient training program.

In vocational trades and industries:

(1) Would destroy educational opportunity for 4,906 boys and girls who are now going to school half time and working half time. They would be out of school entirely.

(2) Would destroy educational opportunity for 3,107 men in training supplemental to their daily employment.

(3) Would destroy educational opportunity for 200 boys who are now taking trade preparatory training.

(4) Would deprive 22 industrial centers of this State from funds necessary to carry on a training program of trade and industrial education.

(5) Would destroy 15 years of earnest effort in building an efficient program of industrial training for those engaged in industry.

In vocational home economics:

(1) Would deprive more than 30,000 home makers from receiving vital instruction in problems relating to the home.

(3) Would handicap the follow-up of the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection in placing its findings and recommendations in every home in the Nation.

(3) Would remove one of the strongest forces for building up the home, which strikes at the foundation of society.

Should vocational education be suspended for one year, as outlined by MCDUFFIE'S committee, it would make impossible the reviving of vocational education in Oklahoma for many years to come. We realize full well that Congress must retrench, and the vocational program is willing to take its share of the retrenchment; but to suspend operation of the vocational program as provided by the Smith-Hughes and George-Reed Acts would be ruinous to the program we have developed through 15 years of cooperative effort.

We earnestly solicit your assistance and careful consideration of the interest of the farm people, home makers, and industrial workers of Oklahoma.

Very truly yours,

JOHN VAUGHAN,
State Superintendent.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—OUR 4-H CLUBS AND EXTENSION WORK

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the most prized and valued asset of our great Nation is its youth. Great are the problems confronting this Nation. The solution of these problems is largely to be placed at the door of the present generation of our young people. They need a thorough training in order to meet these responsibilities.

The 4-H clubs of this Nation provide a splendid training, not only in good citizenship but in the practical duties of life about the farm and about the home. Anyone who has had the privilege to attend the meetings of 4-H clubs as I have, and have seen the exhibits of the varied experiences these boys and girls are getting, could not but be impressed by the fact that here is something of real and tangible value that is being given the boys and girls of this country through agricultural extension. Frankly, I do not know of any other activity of the Department of Agriculture that gives so much direct benefit to the people of this country as this type of extension service. I venture to state that if you were to give to the farm homes of this country the right to choose which of the activities of the Department of Agriculture should be cut out, this activity would be one of the last voted out.

This is an emergency economy measure that we are considering. I am strongly in favor of taking full steps to bring about this much-needed economy. I have voted to reduce my own salary and will vote for the major portions of this and other bills to reduce and deflate Government expenses. I firmly believe that from this depression, as tragic as it is, will come a great good to this country in the form of a universal demand to reduce taxes, Federal, State, and local. I realize that the big portion of the taxes paid by the farmers of this country, as well as by the small home owner in the city, is paid to support local, county, and city government. Yet we can set a good example by cutting our own expenses as well.

However, I see no reason why in the name of economy we should here to-day take hurried action to begin in 1934 to discontinue over a period of 10 years this form of extension work that is to-day giving benefit to almost every farm home in America. If this work should be discontinued, we should at least have full consideration of the matter in the regular manner before the Committee on Agriculture. There is plenty of time before 1934 to do this.

Therefore, I urge you, my colleagues, to strike this section from this bill. If I have not convinced you of the value of this extension work, at least vote to strike this from this bill so that it can be brought before us in the regular way, and fair consideration given the whole matter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE ECONOMY BILL

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of every economy that can possibly be effected, but the section of this bill which proposes the elimination of all appropriations for vocational education is not economy but destructive parsimony. I am especially sorry that the President has seen fit to urge that this be done.

The generation of which you and I are a part, as well as that of our sons and daughters, has already suffered needlessly from this panic to an extent bordering closely upon the limits of human endurance. By this measure we are now proposing to further penalize the coming generation by taking from the children of the farmer the one thing which will enable them to compete in a life so complex that many have come to despair of a continued existence.

This proposed economy does not come from any desire to save the farmer a single penny, and those of you who go back to your farmer constituents and tell them of your wonderful record in saving him from burdensome taxes ought also to tell him that for every hundred million dollars that you have saved it will save him personally exactly 15 cents. It is not a trade that is likely to impress the farmer.

When it becomes necessary to chisel and pinch the pennies for children's education in order to balance the Budget, those from whom you are taking the pennies ought also to be told why it is necessary. Nearly twice the amount that it is proposed to save by this entire measure will, before the end of the present fiscal year, be taken from the Treasury in the form of loans to industry.

I have no facts to deny that it is necessary to provide this money to industry, neither am I in possession of any facts which assure me that it was necessary to supply it. We are told behind closed doors that unless we supplied $2,000,000,000 to banks and industry the whole country would collapse. It appears that now that the interests demanding these $2,000,000,000 have secured what they want, that all of the advantages which government has afforded the poor man must collapse, anyway. We have denied food to the hungry, and it now appears that we shall deny an opportunity to children for education that they may better fit themselves for the burdens which shall come to them in the form of a national debt a large part of which is now being created because we refuse to put the burden where it belongs.

The blame for an ill-conceived economy measure should not be placed upon the members of the Economy Committee, who have worked so arduously in bringing in this bill. They have done the best they could, no doubt, in the limited time which they had.

The whole program is an effort to patch up the deficiencies of the present administration. On July 1, 1931, our deficiency amounted to approximately $1,000,000,000. Only the Congress has the power to remedy such a situation, either by effecting economies or increasing taxation, or both. Why, then, with a billion-dollar deficit facing us nearly a year ago, did the President not call the Congress into session so that sufficient time might be had to effect real economies? Why are we compelled to consummate in eight weeks a program which the President by his refusal to call Congress into session refused to consider important.

If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a good institution, and I grant that it is, why were we not permitted to legislate such a corporation into existence a year ago? We certainly could have saved thousands of banks that have failed since that time because no such agency existed.

Why were we not permitted to free credit as provided for in the Steagall-Glass bill a year ago? If it is good now, it would have been better then. Why is every measure that we have been forced to enact an emergency measure? There can be no other answer than that "these measures are emergency measures because the time for well-considered legislation has expired, so we must act quickly; it is an emergency."

It is now proposed that an emergency exists so grave that it is necessary to take the one means which many of our children have for an education away from them. It took years of fighting to secure national appropriations for vocational training. Are we to throw it away because a President who had ample time to act in the interests of true economy deliberately threw away his opportunity and then comes to us at the last minute with a plea not for economy but for destructive parsimony?

I am not going to vote to deny the children of this country an education to save the very rich people of this country from paying increased income taxes, for the great proportion of our Federal income is from the income taxes of the corporations and the rich individuals. That is where it ought to come from. The farmers and laborers do not pay it and ought not to. I am for protecting the poor and the helpless.

ENSIGNS IN THE LINE OF THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill H. R. 8083 providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, for printing under the rule.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. BANKHEAD, by direction of the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 205

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11051, a bill to provide for the leasing and other utilization of the Muscle Shoals properties in the interest of national defense and of agriculture, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, when does the gentleman intend to bring the rule up?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can only state to the gentleman what the tentative arrangement is with reference to that. If I am wrong in the statement I trust the majority leader or the Speaker will correct. My understanding is—and that is the understanding of those who are very anxious for the consideration of this bill—that the rule for its consideration will be offered at the conclusion of the pending bill.

Mr. SNELL. Is the gentleman going to put that in ahead of the other appropriation bills, when we are in a hurry to get through with the session?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is the program.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the intention of the leaders of the House to have this rule considered on Monday and displace the Consent Calendar?

Mr. RAINEY. We will not displace that calendar.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides for the Consent Calendar on Monday next, and no one can change that rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Many members of the Committee on Military Affairs who are opposed to the bill are interested to know when the rule will be brought up for consideration.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Does the rule provide that the two hours' debate shall be confined to the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the earliest time at which the rule would be brought up would be Tuesday next?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now stand in recess until 7.30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. There has been some suggestion that we might perhaps agree to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and avoid an evening session to-night.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If that is the wish of the House, I shall be very glad to comply with it.

Mr. SNELL. We have been driven very hard this week and men's nerves are pretty well on edge. I think you will accomplish more if you will adjourn the House now and meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow than if you attempt to run through until 10 or 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

SENATE

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, April 29, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 3270. An act for the relief of Daniel S. Schaffer Co. (Inc.); and

H. R. 6662. An act to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. SMOOT. I would prefer not to yield for that purpose. I am compelled to leave the Chamber soon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have noticed in the RECORD some statements made with reference to the Department of Commerce bill and the appropriations made in the past as compared with the appropriations of to-day. I feel that the RECORD ought to be corrected. Therefore I ask for a few moments to do so.

I notice that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on two or three occasions referred to the Department of Commerce as having asked for $54,000,000 in appropriations for the fiscal year 1933. In this he is wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, has the Senator notified the Senator from Mississippi that he expected to make this address?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator just declined to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. It is only a question of figures.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to put in the RECORD the actual figures.

The figures the Senator from Mississippi was quoting represent the total appropriation for the Department of Commerce for the current year. The total of the estimates submitted to this Congress for the Department of Commerce for next year was $44,700,000. It will thus be seen that the department had made a very material cut and had acted on the basis of the $54,000,000 appropriation just as the Senator from Mississippi suggested it should act.

The Senator also makes reference to the rapid expansion of the department during the period of Mr. Hoover's term as Secretary. A reference to the Budgets shows that for the fiscal year 1913, under the administration of President Wilson, $15,300,000 was the total appropriation, whereas in 1920 the total appropriation was $37,000,000, an increase of practically 150 per cent. This is on the same basis of comparison used by critics of the department. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1921 was $24,200,000, and for the fiscal year 1928, the last one of Mr. Hoover's service as Secretary, the total appropriation was $37,600,000, or an increase of about 56 per cent. It should be borne in mind that during the period that Mr. Wilson was President there were no new activities created in the Department of Commerce, nor were there any bureaus or agencies transferred to the department from other departments of the Government, whereas a large part of the increased cost during Mr. Hoover's term as Secretary can be easily accounted for in view of the transfer of the Bureau of Mines and the Patent Office to the department from the Interior Department and the creation through an act of Congress of the aeronautics branch.

In view of the fact that we are now interested in the forthcoming appropriation bill for the Department of Commerce and many claims have been made as to the great increase in its expenditures, we should consider its appropriations in the light of what causes brought about the expansion. During the past three years, under a specific act of Congress for taking the decennial census, over $39,000,000 have been appropriated in addition to the regular Budget of the Department.

Furthermore, any comparison of this character should take full cognizance of the transfer on January 1, 1923, to the Department of Commerce, under an act of Congress, of 121 employees from the Treasury Department engaged on customs statistics. The Aeronautics Branch, organized through an act of Congress, now has 2,349 employees and requires an appropriation of about $10,000,000. The Patent Office was transferred to the Commerce Department April 1, 1925, and the Bureau of Mines July 1, 1925, both from the Department of the Interior. The employees of those two units now number 1,442 and 1,020, respectively. They should be excluded in making a comparison of costs over an 11-year period. With these additions taken into consideration, there has been an increase in the eight old bureaus of the department of about 1,700 employees in the 10½ years, or 1.7 per cent a year.

Omitting the extra cost of the census carried in 1922, the eight old bureaus had about $21,700,000 appropriated for their use, whereas the estimates for 1933 for these same activities call for $28,250,000, or an increase of about 30 per cent, and practically one-half of this amount is due to the classification of salaries through an act of Congress and subsequent increases on account of what are generally known as the Welch Act and the Brookhart Act. This is exceptionally small for a department which serves the business and marine interests. These increases have been made gradually in response to demands made on the department by industry, and in many instances to take care of duties imposed upon the department by Congress. Secretary Lamont explained this matter in detail before the Appropriations Committee of the House in supporting the estimates for the next fiscal year.

As I mentioned earlier, the increase in the expenditures of the Commerce Department during the past 11 years can be largely explained on the basis of figures over which the Secretaries had no control, but during the eight years under President Wilson there were no factors of this character to be taken into consideration.

In this connection as chairman of the Public Buildings Commission I would like to take occasion to respond to some of the criticisms which have been directed at Mr. Hoover and the present Secretary of Commerce regarding the new Department of Commerce Building in this city. Some critics appear to take keen delight in attempting to hold Mr. Hoover responsible for conceiving the idea of a new building, and for its construction as well as for the expense involved in erection. It would be enlightening to look into the facts.

In the annual report of Secretary Redfield for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, there appears a strong appeal for the construction of a new building to house the activities of the Department of Commerce. This recommendation was repeatedly made subsequently by Mr. Redfield, and in his annual report for 1918 he lists among the urgent needs of the department, "A Government-owned commerce building to house all services except the Bureau of Standards and the laboratory-aquarium of the Bureau of Fisheries."

In the annual report of Secretary of Commerce Alexander for the fiscal year 1920, the necessity for a permanent home for the department is again stressed in the following language:

> One of the greatest needs of the department is a permanent home for the proper housing of its several bureaus and divisions. This matter has been repeatedly mentioned by my predecessor, who has covered the subject so thoroughly that I can only emphasize what has already been said. The Commerce Building, a rented structure, houses the divisions of the office of the Secretary, three of the department's bureaus, and portions of two others. The building is inadequate to the growing needs of the department, and it is obvious that, with the overcrowding and scattering of activities, results so highly desirable can not be obtained. It is earnestly recommended that steps be taken at an early date looking to the erection of a building suitably adapted to the efficient administration of the department.

Thus it appears that there can be no question as to the unanimous opinion of persons familiar with the activities of the Department of Commerce that the various organizations should be concentrated in one building.

The site upon which the Department of Commerce Building now stands was purchased by the Government in the year 1910 at a total cost of $2,459,831.08. The act of June 30, 1906, which was amended on May 20, 1908, March 4, 1910, and June 25, 1910, was the authority for the purchase of this site. The purchase was made in 75 parcels, the title to the first being acquired January 27, 1910, and the title to the last parcel December 22, 1910.

In 1910 a competition was held in which commercial architects submitted designs and plans for the construction of a new Department of Commerce and Labor building and other Government buildings which were in contemplation at that time. The committee on awards on January 5, 1911, selected the plans and designs submitted by York & Sawyer for the new Department of Commerce and Labor Building. Questions were then raised as to whether existing legislation was sufficient to proceed with the contracts for the work. Numerous delays then occurred, and finally contracts for plans were canceled. The World War then occurred and caused further delay. It was not until the act of May 25, 1926, when the country was in a state of great prosperity, that legislative authorization was secured for the construction of the building. This authorization was on thorough and scientific study as a part of congressional plans to provide modern and efficient housing facilities, to eliminate the use of rented structures and war-time temporary buildings in a dilapidated condition, to protect invaluable records from irreparable loss by fire, and to bring together activities widely scattered over the city. The design of the building was approved August 16, 1927, and a contract for the first work in connection with the erection of a building was signed October 4, 1927.

The statement has been made that the new building contains 52 acres of floor space. This is probably based upon the gross ground area which the building occupies, without taking into consideration the six large courts. The floor space actually amounts to approximately 36.8 acres instead of 52 acres, as claimed.

The reference to a private elevator with two operators for the Secretary is also wholly misleading. The elevator referred to is available for the use not only of the Secretary of Commerce and his immediate staff but the employees in the whole section of the building in the vicinity of his office, including incoming and outgoing visitors to the entire suite of offices located there. It is difficult to understand the necessity for two operators on a single elevator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I would prefer not to do so; I am very anxious to conclude.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask the Senator how much it costs the Government to run that particular elevator?

Mr. SMOOT. No more than any other elevator that is in the building—not as much as our elevator here in the Capitol.

Mr. McKELLAR. About how much would that be?

Mr. SMOOT. I should think about $375 a month. There are two employees on it, and then there would be whatever cost of upkeep might be attached to it.

While on this subject, it might be well to state that the claims that there is a watchman whose sole duty is to supervise the use of the elevator is untrue. There has never been nor is there now any person exercising any degree of supervision whatever as to the use of the elevator.

The Senator knows there is a private elevator in the Treasury Building, put there when the Treasury Building was first erected. It is operated to-day, and that elevator, I will say to the Senator, is used by the employees of the Government outside of the Secretary of the Treasury's own office.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was addressing his remarks to me, I believe. I want to say to him that this is the first time I ever knew there was a private elevator for the Treasury Department. I do not have as much occasion to use it as the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. But statements of various kinds as to the private elevator in the Department of Commerce Building have been heralded all over the United States and bandied back and forth on both sides of the Chamber, and so I thought I would state the facts in the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. SMOOT. I am nearly through.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Department of Commerce Building is such an enormous building for a comparatively recently created department that the size of it, as well as the cost of it, has rather astonished me. Why should we have constructed a building with 46 acres of floor space for the Department of Commerce when we have not done that for any other department of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. Considering the governmental activities which have been transferred to that department, the floor space per employee will be found to be less than in most of the other Government buildings, I will say to the Senator.

Prior to the removal of various governmental activities to the new quarters, the personnel of the Department of Commerce was located in 14 different buildings scattered throughout the city. In every instance they were overcrowded. In many of the structures occupied by the Government the employees suffered from unbearable heat in summer and low temperature in winter, from drafts and poor ventilation, and from lack of natural light, as well as from congestion and other insanitary conditions.

While the loss to the Government because of scattered and inadequate housing can not be computed with any accuracy, some measure of these losses can be determined by considering individual items. The expense of one of several of our bureaus housed in temporary war-time structures which was forced to close on account of the excessive heat during the summer of 1930—and I might also include the summers of 1927, 1928, and 1929—indicates a direct loss of $48,091.26. During one of the days of extreme heat I walked through some of those temporary buildings. The temperature was nearly 100°, and I did not see how people could live if they were compelled to spend the afternoon in those buildings under such circumstances. The conditions became so oppressive that it was decided to lay off the employees, and in one temporary building alone the loss thereby caused was $48,091.26. The same conditions existed during the summer of 1931, and there is no reason to assume that they will not prevail again in the years to come.

The cost of the construction of the Department of Commerce Building has been about $17,500,000, as authorized by Congress. The cost of the building was 62.5 cents per cubic foot. It is estimated that the annex to the House Office Building, now under construction, will cost 77 cents per cubic foot; the addition to the Senate Office Building will average 93 cents per cubic foot; the Supreme Court Building will cost about $1.06 per cubic foot; the United States Chamber of Commerce Building in Washington cost 86 cents per cubic foot; the Empire State Building in New York City cost between 70 and 80 cents per cubic foot; the Chrysler Building in the same city cost 80 cents per cubic foot; the Sterick Building in Memphis, Tenn., cost 73.2 cents per cubic foot; the Philtower Building at Tulsa, Okla., 70 cents; the Watts Building, Birmingham, Ala., cost 75.5 cents per cubic foot. These figures regarding the cost of commercial buildings were taken from one issue of a monthly magazine. Undoubtedly hundreds of other instances could be cited if a review of building costs were to be made.

Instead of being in any sense an extravagance, the new Department of Commerce Building represents a decided economy to the Government. This building contains 1,002,631 square feet of office space and 89,370 square feet of storage space, which is sufficient to house all but one of the bureaus of the department which were formerly scattered about the city of Washington. This space at actual current rental values in Washington of $2.25 per square foot for office space and $0.40 for storage space represents a total yearly rental value to the Government of $2,291,665.

I have been compelled on behalf of the Government to sign authorizations for the payment of such rentals for years and years, until I have become very tired of doing it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator what instrumentality of the Commerce Department is not housed in the building now? The Senator said one was not. Are not all the bureaus and services now housed in the one department building?

Mr. SMOOT. All that I mentioned are quartered in the new building to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are not paying any rent on the outside at all?

Mr. SMOOT. Not for the buildings which the Government previously occupied.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean for the Department of Commerce?

Mr. SMOOT. We are not. The actual cost to the Government, however, is considerably less than the amount I just mentioned. Taking into account complete amortization of the construction cost in 40 years (despite the fact that the permanency of construction insures practically indefinite life), interest on the total cost of the building and land, and annual maintenance charges, the yearly cost to the Government amounts to $1,502,700.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much did we pay in rent?

Mr. SMOOT. Over $2,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, there is quite a considerable saving that ought to be reflected in the pending appropriation bill, ought it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been, and much more than that. I referred to the 10 per cent cut—perhaps the Senator was not here at the time—and it means the death of some of the bureaus of that department of our Government. Taking into consideration, also, the annual taxes which would be paid on the land and building if it were owned and operated privately, and the income tax, based on an estimated return of 6 per cent, which would be paid by private owners, the total yearly cost to the Government is $1,748,032. Thus the saving to the Government, represented by the difference between the total yearly rental value ($2,291,665) and the total yearly cost ($1,748,032) is $543,633, or $21,745,320 in the 40-year amortization period, an amount substantially in excess of the total cost of the building and land.

The Senator from Mississippi also alluded to the increase in the expenses of the White House under Mr. Hoover, and stated that in 1926, under Mr. Coolidge, the expense amounted to $483,000, whereas in 1932, under Mr. Hoover, it was $532,000. This is an increase of $49,000, or practically 10 per cent. Members of Congress should be somewhat careful about the use of such data, for sooner or later some one is going to call attention to the fact that the appropriation for the Senate in 1926 was $2,764,000, whereas for 1932 it was $3,578,000, an increase of $814,000, or nearly 30 per cent, and that the appropriation for the House was $6,541,000 in 1926 and $8,434,000 in 1932, an increase of $1,893,000, or 28 per cent. I wonder whether we will be able to accomplish reductions in the appropriation for the House and Senate to bring it down to only a 10 per cent increase over 1926, like the percentage of increase in the expenses of the White House.

Mr. President, I simply wanted the figures I have cited to go into the RECORD.

TAX BURDENS ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, yesterday I called attention to the mounting burden of farm indebtedness which threatens to engulf our agriculture. To-day I want to call attention to another factor in the farm situation which is equally distressing, namely, the enormous burden of taxation now levied upon agriculture. There is no industry in the country that is so tax ridden as agriculture, and there is no other great industry in this country that is less able to pay these taxes than agriculture.

Farm taxes in 1930 were 266 per cent or more than two and one-half times higher than the pre-war level. Mr. President, I wish to insert here a table showing how rapidly and progressively this tax burden has increased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Index numbers of farm taxation

(1910-1914=100)

[Bureau of Agricultural Economics, U. S. Department of Agriculture]

Year:	Taxes
1914	100
1915	102
1916	104
1917	106
1918	118
1919	130
1920	155
1921	217
1922	232
1923	246
1924	249
1925	250
1926	253
1927	258
1928	263
1929	267
1930	266

Mr. HOWELL. This table shows that, assuming the taxes paid by the farmer in 1914 were 100, they had increased to 155 in 1920, and in 1930 they had reached 266.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is not a large part of the increase in the farmer's tax represented by an increase in State taxation?

Mr. HOWELL. There is no question that a large part of the increase in the farmer's tax, especially in the Middle West, is due to the school tax, and also State taxes have increased. I was going to refer to the fact that these taxes were local; but, nevertheless, they are taxes, and they are a tremendous burden upon agriculture.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for just a moment further, let me say that in my native town, which the Senator knows well, Dexter, Mich., a man who came there from the country to take charge of a farmers' cooperative told me, if I remember the figures correctly, that when he moved into Dexter 20 years ago the taxes on his farm were $60 a year; they are now $240 a year, and he can not raise as much on that farm, or his tenant can not raise as much, as he formerly did, because the land is depreciating all the time, while all his implements and everything else he has to buy have increased in price. So I know from that one example—and I could cite others—that what the Senator has said is true. The farmer's taxes have enormously increased—increased locally, increased by reason of road appropriations, increased by reason of school taxes, and increased by reason of the enormous advance in the price of implements and materials used by the farmer.

Mr. HOWELL. I wish to say to the able Senator from New York that Michigan statistics afford a glaring example of the high ratios of the farmer's taxes to his income.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I was impressed with what the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] said. The country generally is looking to us for a reduction of the burden of taxation on the farmers. I have been examining that question, and I find that in my own State, while the Federal Government during the last 10 years, until the depression came upon us, has reduced taxes almost one-third per capita, my own State has increased State taxes three times. The same thing is pretty generally true throughout the country; and yet the citizens of America seem to feel that Congress is responsible for the increased taxation.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, even before the present depression, farm taxes were absorbing a large percentage of farm returns. Taxes absorbed 32.6 per cent of the rentals on Colorado farms in 1926; 29.8 per cent of the rentals on South Dakota farms in 1926; 20 per cent in Virginia; 54.3 per cent in Michigan in 1925; 41 per cent in Ohio in 1922; 27 per cent in Iowa in 1927. Undoubtedly the situation is much worse to-day.

A study of farm taxes in Wisconsin showed that in 1927 a total of 2,593,163 acres, or nearly one-fourth of the entire area of 17 northern counties in Wisconsin, were offered for sale for tax delinquency. Over five-sixths of this area had not been redeemed by the owners within almost a year following the sale. In one county, for example, delinquent taxes increased 600 per cent since 1919.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to add just one other note about the Michigan situation.

There is a little weekly paper published in Dexter, my native town, called "The Dexter Leader." I learned to set type in the office of that paper as an office bay and have been interested in it all these years. Prior to the last two or three years I do not remember seeing in that paper more than half a column of mortgage sales. It is shocking to read it now and find whole page and often a page and a half of mortgage sales in that small community, where the farmers have just given up, been unable to meet their payments, and mortgage sales have been advertised.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. LONG. The figures which the Senator presents are very striking, showing the amount of taxes, as the Senator from New York calls attention to, that are being placed upon the farmers. Nevertheless, practically none of these taxes, I take it, are such that the farmers do not need to levy them in order to take care of community requirements, such as school taxes.

Does not that suggest—and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from New York on that point, as in line with our President's speech at Indianapolis—that the need of this country is not to take away from these people what they have, but to impose these taxes at the top, so that the big money-makers of this country could supply what is needed in this country, and not to have them falling at the bottom? Does it not suggest the need of such things as surtaxes on annual incomes and inheritance taxes such as would relieve the people at the bottom of farm life and labor life from having to carry such a burden of taxes as that?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, not only have the farmers suffered from increased taxes, but the same condition has been prevalent throughout our cities. I have heard many complaints respecting taxes here in Washington, and yet the people of Washington do not know what taxation means. I can point out cities where the tax rate is 4 per cent on the assessed valuation; but, of course, to interpret such tax rates it is necessary in each case to know what proportion the assessed valuation bears to the actual valuation. I know, however, that in my city, where the assessed valuation is very close to the actual valuation, the taxes this year will be about 3.2 per cent, as compared to about 1.90 per cent here in the city of Washington.

Mr. President, in Mississippi recently, I am informed, 60,000 farm homes, aggregating more than 7,000,000 acres, and constituting one-fourth of the farm lands of the State, were sold or offered for sale by 82 sheriffs for taxes.

Renick W. Dunlap, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in an address some months ago visualized the enormity of the farm-tax burden by pointing out that farmers yield every fifth day of their time in support of the Government; or, to put it another way, farmers work one year out of every five years in order to pay their taxes. In certain sections of the country taxes have risen so high, he explained, that they amount to the total value of the land every nine years. "In other words," he stated, "the farmers in those sections must buy their farms and pay for them every nine years." The total tax burden of the farmers is estimated at more than $1,000,000,000 annually, which is equivalent to $3,000,000 a day. "There is not any other industry in the United States whose taxes in any way compare with those of agriculture," he declared.

These tax burdens would be heavy enough in a period of high prices; but with the farm price level so disastrously low, farm taxes in many sections are virtually confiscatory, as shown by the large number of farms which have already been taken over by the States for unpaid taxes. How can the farmers expect to pay their taxes on 30 to 50 cent wheat, 5 to 10 cent eggs, 15-cent butter, and 5-cent cotton?

We hear a great clamor on every hand that the Federal Budget be balanced. I agree that this should be done; but if an equal amount of energy and diligence were applied to assisting the farmers of the Nation to balance their budget, we should have very little difficulty in balancing the Federal Budget. If agriculture were restored to prosperity by restoring its price level, our factories could be reopened, and large numbers of the unemployed could return to work to supply the needs of 44 per cent of our population, including other ruralists than farmers. The restoration of the farm purchasing power, and the revival of industry which would result therefrom, would restore the sources of Government revenue which have dried up as a result of the depression.

The most effective way to balance the Federal Budget and to create a surplus is to restore prosperity to the people of the country. We can not collect taxes from people who have no income. This Congress is spending too much time treating results instead of remedying causes. It is of little avail to give relief for rheumatic pains so long as the infection causing the pain is allowed to run rampant. Similarly, it is of little avail for us to extend credit to distressed agriculture and do nothing to remove the causes of its difficulties.

I recognize that the farm taxes to which I have alluded are largely local, not Federal. However, they are no less a fact; and there must be added thereto the indirect taxes of a Federal origin paid by the farmer.

What I want to emphasize is the enormous burden, in addition to his indebtedness, which the farmer is carrying, notwithstanding his buying power has been reduced one-half. The last report of the Department of Agriculture respecting farm indexes and what the farmer must pay for what he purchases indicates that he is receiving 59, as compared with 100, in 1914, and that he is paying for the things he buys 114, as compared to 100 in 1914. This injustice so far as his buying power is concerned rests squarely upon our national, social fabric, because it is not a question of the production of wealth, but of the distribution of wealth. For that reason the farmer is properly appealing for relief to Congress, the authority which has been created by the politico-social organization we call the United States to deal with such questions and appeals.

Mr. President, what are we going to do about it? As I have stated before, we have been in session nearly five months, and there is little more than a month remaining of the session. Not one constructive measure has been enacted into law to aid the farmer. He has been loaned money in certain sections of the country, where, through drought or grasshoppers or other cause, he has not had even the seed with which to plant his farm. But, Mr. President, that is simply treating a symptom, and it is something that might occur at any time. We have authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan a certain proportion of its assets to agricultural credit associations; but the farmer has borrowed too much money already. What he needs is to earn some money.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is entirely right. These men do not want to borrow money. They want markets for their crops. They want to sell them, and I find that this great problem of the farm is not located west of the Alleghenies alone. I may say to the Senator that I am having most appealing letters from farm homes in my own State of New York. We stand eighth in agriculture. We have diversity of crops in my section; but, in spite of that, there is great distress in the farm homes of New York, and I share with the Senator his thought that some solution must be found.

If the Senator will bear with me for a moment, I was much interested in the bill which the Senator presented the other day, the purpose of which, as I understand, is to make a test in one crop of the McNary-Haugen principle of the equalization fee in order that there may perhaps be a court test to determine its constitutionality. I am correct in that, am I?

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Every time I had an opportunity—I do not know whether it was two or three or four times—I voted for that bill because, as I see it, the equalization fee, being a variable amount, would act to discourage overproduction. Almost every scheme for farm relief that has been presented here has been one which, in the ultimate analysis, would increase production, and thus increase the evil, certainly not relieve it. It might relieve the symptoms, as the Senator has said, for a little while, but the cause of the disease would not be removed.

I hope the Senator will press that bill. I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, I am glad to support it, because I would like to see that plan tried. I discussed it time and time again with the Senator from Oregon, who worked so diligently at the time it was pending, from the beginning. We ought to make a test of it. All these other things have failed. Nothing we have done so far has been of any value whatever to the farmer.

The farmer's distress has increased from year to year, ever since we have tried to do anything, and it has increased out of proportion to the increase of distress in other walks of life. So I hope the Senator will press that measure, and that we may hope to have the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry report upon it so that it may be enacted into law, if possible, this coming month, because something must be done.

I agree fully with the Senator that the prosperity of the farmer determines the prosperity of the country. When there is an inability on the part of the farmer to sell his products, there are bread lines in my city. We have a common interest. I know I speak for the teeming millions of my city when I say that we realize there the necessity of the farmer, and we want to do what we can to aid him.

As the Senator has said, there is no relief in lending money to the farmer; it simply puts the farmer more into debt. It means he never will work out his problem. So I hope the Senator will press his proposed legislation, and let us have a test of that particular measure, in order that we may see whether or not it will operate to give some measure of relief.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I have not here on the floor, during the remarks I have made upon several occasions respecting agriculture, advocated a particular measure. I have merely advocated the enactment of some constructive measure for the benefit of the farmer, and I am willing to accept anything that is offered that promises relief. What I am here talking about is that we have not done anything, that there is nothing before us, that the adjournment of Congress is near at hand, and I fear that we will close this session without even attempting to do anything constructive for the farmer. Each political party will have violated its promise to the farmers of the country, as set forth in the 1928 platforms.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I beg to differ with the Senator. I think all political parties have kept their pledge to agriculture. They pledged themselves to see that agriculture and industry were placed upon an equality, and they have brought industry down to where agriculture was.

Mr. HOWELL. I beg the Senator's pardon. Industry is getting 114 for its products, as compared with 59 the farmer is getting. Conditions have brought industry down to 114, but while doing so the farmer has been reduced to 59.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Industry is on the road to bankruptcy with the farmer. They have not traveled quite so long as the farmer has in that direction, but they are getting down to equality.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; but it is largely the 59 the farmer is receiving that is causing bankruptcy for industry.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, yes; I agree with the Senator. Industry took so much from 1920 to 1930 that they destroyed their own markets, destroying the purchasing power of agriculture and labor as well.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; the differential against the farmer nearly killed the goose that lays the golden egg.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. Some of us advocated the export debenture for agriculture. Does he not think that would be a help to agriculture, if we adopted it right now?

Mr. HOWELL. I advocated the export debenture plan when it was before the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator think it would be helpful right now?

Mr. HOWELL. It would be, if the Treasury could stand it; but it would simply be pulling out another bung from the Treasury barrel at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Anything is going to cost money that will do the farmer any good, is it not?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; but the question is not what we want in the way of legislation but what we can get. At this time I have no hope that Congress, endeavoring to fill up the Treasury, will adopt a plan which, as I suggested, would remove another bung from the Treasury barrel.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me interrupt the Senator further. The Senate on two occasions adopted the debenture, and it would now be the law, except for the administration and the old House of Representatives, which was controlled by the administration. I wanted to call that to the Senator's attention when he was saying that both parties had broken their pledges. We tried to do it, but we could not do it because the administration and the former House of Representatives would not let us do it. Is not that true?

Mr. HOWELL. It is true; but what I am urging now is that we have been in session for five months, and we have not attempted to do anything for the farmer.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. We are about to adjourn; and I ask, Are we going to do anything? What does the Senator think about it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think that the Congress or the Senate is going to do anything, because I do not think the administration will let Congress do anything.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the Senator feel that because he thinks the administration would defeat any plan we passed we should not act?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; and I was calling the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senate did act on two occasions, but the administration defeated the plan. The Senator is stating that the plan he suggests would cost money. Has he any plan that will not cost something? We ought to go on and do our duty regardless of the administration, and I think the debenture is the only thing we could now do to open up foreign channels, and I am for it. I would vote for it to-morrow, and I am wondering whether the Senator would not vote for it to-morrow?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am ready to vote for any measure that will aid the farmer. I am talking about a constructive measure. I am not talking about lending the farmer more money, or giving him more money, or donating more wheat.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. There is a measure before Congress, I will say to the Senator, which would help. The trouble with the debenture is that there is not the money in the Treasury to take care of it. The further trouble is that too much taxes are on the backs of the weak. But we can supply the funds the Treasury needs for the debenture and to relieve the lower crust of this country of tax burdens if we will adopt a resolution instructing the Finance Committee not to allow wealth to be accumulated in the hands of a handful of people. In other words, instead of allowing 504 men to earn $1,185,000,000, if we will let those 504 men earn $504,000,000, and throw approximately $700,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States, we will have money enough to support the debenture, and along the same line, we would have money enough to relieve the people of some of the taxes they are having to pay.

You can form any kind of a law you want to form chipping around at the top of the tree, but the only thing that is going to cure the farm-relief problem is the providing of money in the Treasury of the United States to assist the farmers; and the only way by which we can do that is by putting the taxes at the top. The only way we can cure this situation is to break up this abnormal, criminal, swollen-fortune system of the United States. That is the only cure, and a measure looking to that end is before this Congress. But it has as much chance of passing as a snowball has of going through a fireplace.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, assuming that what the Senator from Louisiana has been saying is true, he admits it could not get through Congress; and I call the Senate's attention again to the fact that it does not make any difference what kind of legislation we want, if we want to get something, we will have to find something that will pass Congress.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas that we apply the debenture plan, that would mean reducing the net income from duties which would otherwise reinforce the Treasury, while we are trying to fill up the Treasury. I do not believe Congress would consent at the present time, or that we could prevail upon the Congress within the next month, to pass a bill of that kind—neutralizing part of our efforts to fill the Treasury.

That is not the only possible form of relief which might be afforded, however. It is a fact that the production of wealth is governed by invariable laws. We can not by legislation change the rainfall, the fertility of the soil, the efficiency of the farmer. There are invariable laws governing those things. But when it comes to the distribution of wealth—and that is the farmer's trouble—the laws governing the distribution of wealth are not invariable. They are just what society makes them.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the laws governing the distribution of wealth have been different in different ages; they are different in different countries to-day; and they can be still more different if society sees fit to make the change.

Congress, so far as the United States is concerned, is the agency of society to whom has been given the power and authority to do just that sort of thing. And we have done it. The railroads came to us in 1920 and said, "We are not getting our share of the national income. We want you to fix prices for us so that we will get our share of the national income." And Congress did it, not indirectly but directly, for the first time in our history. By doing so, they changed the distribution of wealth in this country in a measure. They compelled more money to go out of the shipper's pockets and into the railroad's pockets than had gone before.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in every one of the States, or in nearly all of them, there have been public-service commissions created which have fixed prices for electric-power plants for the past two or three decades. They have indulged in price fixing pure and simple, and what has been the consequence? Notwithstanding the present depression the power plants of this country had their banner year in 1930, so far as income was concerned. Last year the amount of income received by those electric power companies was only 1.2 per cent below what it was in 1930 and was 1.5 per cent more than it was in 1929, the banner year in the matter of gross income for the operating power companies of this country.

Senators will recall that the other day in New York Mr. Insull, president of the Midwest Utilities Co., in a plea in abatement respecting the receivership that had overtaken the Midwest, said that its operating companies had had their best year in 1931. The cause of the failure of the Midwest Utilities Co. was that it had $37,000,000 of short-time paper coming due June 1 which it could not meet.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator, because he mentioned high freight rates and the distribution of wealth, to the fact that before the Commerce Committee, of which the Senator is a member, there is pending a bill to provide for the completion of inland waterways in the hope of bringing an end to the embargo on goods which can not move on account of high railroad freight rates. The Senator talks of a program that the Congress ought to enact to remedy the evils from which we are suffering and to change the policies we have pursued which have brought us to the condition in which we now find ourselves.

I would like to ask the Senator if he does not think that one of the steps that ought to be taken is the completion of the inland waterways, so the people who are suffering from high freight rates may enjoy the lower cost of transportation which those waterways would afford?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I agree that we should go just as far as practicable in the improvement of our inland waterways for the purpose of reducing the freight that is paid by the agricultural interests upon their products to get those products to the seaboard; but while we are now considering the bill introduced by the Senator from Minnesota we have also been considering a bill to fix the prices for intercoastal shipping, something that has never been done before. We have a measure before the Commerce Committee which proposes another element changing the factors affecting the distribution of wealth in this country, because when we fix prices we necessarily affect the distribution of wealth, or else the fixing of prices would be futile.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has alluded to the difficulties of agriculture. One of the difficulties is the low price level and the purchasing power of our dollar. I would like to ask the Senator if he does not think this measure would very greatly assist agriculture and solve perhaps our present credit problem? I refer to the bill S. 4229, which I introduced and which declares it to be policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale market for the year 1926 shall be restored and maintained by the expansion and contraction of credit and currency through the powers of the United States and its agencies.

I think if we could enact that legislation it would very greatly assist agriculture, because it would raise the price level of commodities. The bill provides a way of doing it, and makes it the duty of the Federal Reserve Board and other agencies of government to carry out that policy. I think that would be a very great help in fixing the purchasing power of the dollar at the index of 1926. There were 560 commodities examined for the years 1922 up to and including 1929, and the average is the year 1926. If we stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar at that figure and authorize and direct and make it mandatory for the Federal Reserve Board, through its agencies and the other agencies of government, to maintain it by expansion and contraction of credit at that index, I think our financial problem would be largely solved and it would greatly take care of the interest of agriculture.

Mr. HOWELL. I will say to the able Senator from Florida that I agree with him. I think most economists are agreed that whenever there is expansion of currency such as took place during the war, there is a rise in the commodity level, and that with a contraction of currency there is a fall in commodity level. If we are to judge the economic future of man by the past, as we do the political history of mankind, what is our fate?

Considering a comprehensive graph indicating commodity prices, we will note that after the inflation of 1815, following the Napoleonic wars, commodity prices continued to fall for 30 years. I do not mean to say that there were not some periods of prosperity in between, but every 10 years the commodity levels were lower than they were at the beginning of that 10-year period.

What took place in 1864? For 30 years after that inflation there was a fall in commodity level. If we are to judge the economic future by the economic past of man, what is going to take place? Why, we have just started on a period of fall in commodity prices. We have only covered 12 years of those 30 years. We have 18 years to go. Whereas some of the ablest economists will urge that they hope this will not be our fate, none of them will prophesy positively to the contrary. Unless something is done such as the Senator from Florida has proposed, we are probably in for a period of falling prices during which we may have periods of prosperity, but they will occur on a falling market.

That is what has affected agriculture. But for industrial products we have maintained the prices through the tariff. By effective legislation we have fixed and maintained prices for railroad services so that during the last nine years ending with 1931 they have been able to pay $3,500,000,000 in dividends, and I am merely speaking of class 1 roads, and moreover they put aside $2,500,000,000 of surplus.

But how with the farmer? As I pointed out yesterday, whereas his mortgage indebtedness in 1910 was only a little more than $3,000,000,000, it had risen to $9,500,000,000 last year. We have been fixing prices for others, but there is not the will of Congress, apparently, to do as much for the agricultural industry. True, we say to the farmer "We have given you a tariff just as we have given industry a tariff," but he answers, "A tariff on steel means what to me? It means that an industry with less than 20 concerns in the business is able to control its prices because they can have their managers or other representatives gather together at luncheon every noon for the adjustment of prices." Then he points out that one of those 20 concerns produces more than one-half of all the steel, and the consequence is that the 19 others wisely conclude that intelligent cooperation is the best thing for them.

But the farmer continues and says, "There are 6,300,000 farm factories in this country, and we can not get together." There are certain bovines—among them the yak—that can not consume corn while our domestic cattle can. The situation is like saying to the owner of bovines of that character, "Here is corn, a well-known food for cattle." He answers, "It does not do for my stock." But, we urge, "It is feed." "Yes," he would reply, "it is feed for some, but not for my stock."

So it is with the tariff. It is a help for industry with limited numbers of concerns producing different products, but it is little help so far as price-fixing is concerned, in the case of an industry including 6,300,000 farm factories. We have not treated the farmer with equality in fact; only apparently, that is all.

Mr. President, I had not intended to extend my remarks as I have, but I again want to ask what we are going to do about it. Are we going to adjourn without doing for the farmer? Remember, he knows that if the will is in Congress to act, it can act, and that the excuse that the Executive may not cooperate is not valid—it is merely passing the buck. Only a little more than a month remains of this session of the Congress. Something must be done or we will have to go back and tell the farmer "There is no hope for you. Congress will not act."

The farmer was once a serf. He became a peasant. Not until he came to this country did the farmer develop as we have known him. What took place in this country? For decades upon decades he was subsidized with cheap land, free land, but that subsidy ceased along about the beginning of this century. Now he is dependent for his income upon the profits of the operation of his farm. Those profits have never been large. In fact, such returns have always been below those which are the lot of other industries. Back in the minds of many is the thought, "How can we help the farmer? History will repeat itself; he is on his way down the economic scale; it is his fate. And, Mr. President, history is beginning to repeat itself.

In closing, I want to invite attention once again that the question involved is one of the distribution of wealth and not of the production of wealth. We are affecting the distribution of wealth constantly here in the Halls of Congress, and the question is whether we are willing to alter the rules and laws controlling the distribution of wealth in behalf of the farmer. If not, let us tell him so, and we will tell him so if this Congress adjourns next June without constructive action in agriculture's behalf.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment in line 1, page 120, may be disagreed to and that the amendment which I send to the desk may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 120, line 1, it is proposed to strike out "$9,500,000" and insert "$9,450,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. On page 120, in line 7, after the word "and," I move to amend by inserting the words "not to exceed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 120, line 7, after the word "and," where it occurs the first time, it is proposed to insert the words "not to exceed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. In the same line I move to strike out the word "only."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 120, line 7, after the word "available," it is proposed to strike out the word "only," so as to read:

Shall be available for coast and land border patrol.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me ask the chairman of the committee why he desires to strike out the word "only" in line 7?

Mr. JONES. The bill as reported reads:

And $2,194,180 shall be available only for coast and land border patrol.

It was not thought wise to limit that appropriation to a particular use, but we do authorize the department to use the $2,194,180 for that purpose unless it deems it wise to use some part of it for some other purpose along the same line. In other words, as the language originally was, the department would have had to use every dollar of it for that particular purpose or not use it at all. So we have left the discretion in the department, but have provided the same amount.

Mr. COPELAND. The money will be used, however, for the coast and land border patrol in the same manner?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. So it does not change the real effect of the appropriation?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for the expenses of the Bureau of Immigration, on page 120, line 8, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$92,250" and insert "$80,000"; in line 11, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$92,250" and insert "$80,000"; and in line 12, after the word "than," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$70,000," so as to make the proviso read:

S. C., title 8, secs. 331–416; U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, secs. 355–384); including personal services; traveling expenses, and not to exceed $400 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the naturalization of aliens when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary of Labor; street-car fare, telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in field offices and telephone toll service in the bureau; necessary supplies and equipment for the Naturalization Service; refunding of naturalization fees upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that the collection and deposit was made through error; not to exceed $25,000 for rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia where suitable quarters can not be obtained in public buildings; and for mileage and fees to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States, the expenditures from this appropriation to be made in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe, $975,770, of which not to exceed $215,000 may be expended for the salary of the commissioner and other personal services in the bureau in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Women's Bureau," on page 123, line 9, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$149,680" and insert "$134,000," so as to read:

For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the Women's Bureau," approved June 5, 1920 (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 11–16; U. S. C., Supp. V, title 29, secs. 12–14), including personal services in the District of Columbia, not to exceed $134,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to. I have an amendment on the desk that I should like to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment proposing to insert "$134,000," it is proposed to strike out "$134,000" and insert "$136,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, let me inquire if the amount by which the appropriation is increased would not have to come out of some other item? I have understood that wherever an increase was made in one item there would have to be a corresponding reduction in some other item.

Mr. JONES. This is merely a limitation.

Mr. BINGHAM. It does not affect the total?

Mr. JONES. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office unless suitable space therefor can be found in a Federal building or is furnished free of rent by State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 124, line 14, to strike out the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay any salary in any field employment office at an annual rate in excess of $2,000, except one director in each State whose salary shall not exceed $3,000, and 23 managers of the veterans' employment service whose salary shall not exceed $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "United States Housing Corporation," on page 125, line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$14,000," so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For officers, clerks, and other employees, and for contingent and miscellaneous expenses, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including blank books, maps, stationery, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, freight and express charges, communication service, travel expense, printing and binding not to exceed $150, and all other miscellaneous items and expenses not included in the foregoing and necessary to collect and account for the receipts from the sale of properties and the receipts from the operation of unsold properties of the United States Housing Corporation, the Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation, property commandeered by the United States through the Secretary of Labor, and to collect the amounts advanced to transportation facilities and others; for payment of special assessments and other utility, municipal, State, and county charges or assessments unpaid by purchasers, and which have been assessed against property in which the United States Housing Corporation has an interest, and to defray expenses incident to foreclosing mortgages, conducting sales under deeds of trust, or reacquiring title or possession of real property under default proceeding, including attorney fees, witness fees, court costs, charges, and other miscellaneous expenses; for the maintenance and repair of houses, buildings, and improvements which are unsold; in all, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the United States Housing Corporation, on page 125, line 22, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$4,900" and insert "$4,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum, and only one person may be employed at that rate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 126, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 2. No appropriation under the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, and the judiciary, available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other position of the Federal Government under such departments and the Judiciary, other than commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and so much of the acts of February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 22, sec. 3a), and February 21, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, sec. 109), as provides automatic increases of salary, respectively, for Foreign Service officers and immigrant inspectors shall not be operative during the period between the date of the approval of this act and June 30, 1933: Provided, That no additional credits for service shall be allowed to any commissioned officer in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for purposes of base or period pay, or for longevity pay before July 1, 1933; any increase of base or period pay for length of service, or longevity pay, which would have been authorized under existing law before that date, shall become effective July 1, 1933, and not earlier, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act: Provided further, That from the date of this act to and including June 30, 1933, payment for personal services made in accordance herewith shall constitute payment in full for such services. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, after line 22, to strike out:

SEC. 3. No appropriation under the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, and the judiciary available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any position under the Federal Government which is vacant on the date of the approval of this act or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be approved in writing by the President of the United States, or in the case of the positions of officers or employees paid out of the appropriations for the Supreme Court of the United States by the Chief Justice of the United States. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended, for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, after line 18, to insert:

SEC. 3. No appropriation under the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, and the judiciary available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any position under the Federal Government which is vacant on the date of the approval of this act or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply (a) to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be authorized or approved in writing by the President of the United States, either individually or in groups, or (b) to temporary, emergency, seasonal, and cooperative positions. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended, for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session: Provided, That such impounding of funds may be waived in writing by the President of the United States in connection with any appropriation or portion of appropriation when, in his judgment, such action is necessary and in the public interest.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment. There is a provision which we intended to put in with reference to the Supreme Court that was omitted from the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 129, line 4, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "or, in the case of the positions of officers or employees paid out of the appropriations for the Supreme Court of the United States, by the Chief Justice of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 129, after line 18, to strike out:

SEC. 4. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses, station wagons, and ambulances) at a cost, delivered and completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary and then only when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicles for official use of the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

And insert:

SEC. 4. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses, ambulances, and station wagons) at a cost, completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, except where, in the judgment of the department, special requirements can not thus be efficiently met, such exceptions, however, to be limited to not to exceed 10 per cent of the total expenditures for such motor vehicles purchased during the fiscal year, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes; and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment, except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary, and then only when the same is approved by the head of the department. The limitations of this proviso shall not apply to any motor vehicle for official use of the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 17, after the word "provision," to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That this section shall not apply to the appropriation for 'Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service,' or to appropriations containing specific rates for subsistence or waivers of the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. No part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used to pay actual expenses of subsistence in excess of $6 each for any one calendar day, or per diem allowance for subsistence in excess of the rate of $5 for any one calendar day, to any officer or employee of the United States, and payments accordingly shall be in full notwithstanding any other statutory provision: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the appropriation for "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," or to appropriations containing specific rates for subsistence or waivers of the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is on its second reading and open to amendment.

Mr. REED. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 131, after line 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 6. Not to exceed 12 per cent of any of the foregoing appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor may be transferred, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to any other appropriation or appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 under the same department, but no appropriation shall be increased more than 15 per cent by such transfers: Provided, That a statement of all transfers of appropriations made hereunder shall be included in the annual Budget for the fiscal year 1935.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have submitted this amendment to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and to other Senators who have been interested in this matter, and I have the impression that it is satisfactory to all of them. In effect it does not run counter to the action of the Senate in reducing the total appropriation of the bill by 10 per cent. It merely allows transfers between the items of appropriation, with the approval of the Director of the Budget, in the same manner as it is now done and has been done for years past in the National Guard items of the Army appropriation bill. It recognizes that, with the speed with which the Appropriations Committee has had to work, it could not, in all cases, work out a completely satisfactory result, and, for this one year only, the amendment allows these exchanges to be made between the items of appropriation without increasing the total.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I am wondering what is the meaning of the language in lines 6 and 7 of the amendment, reading as follows:

but no appropriation shall be increased more than 15 per cent by such transfer.

I assume that the Senator means by that that in transferring a maximum of 12 per cent from one appropriation to another the appropriation for that particular item shall not in any case be increased more than 15 per cent?

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I am not sure that that language is sufficiently definite. Will the Senator look at it, and will the chairman of the committee also cast his eye on it?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have examined that amendment, and I think the idea expressed in the amendment is as stated, namely, that a particular appropriation item shall not be increased more than 15 per cent.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Ought there not be the same amount, 12 per cent?

Mr. JONES. I thought so at first, but I came to the other conclusion.

Mr. REED. It will be seen that in dealing with the reduced amount which is to be increased there is a lower base for the calculation of the percentage than on the higher amount which is to be decreased, and I think it comes to about the same result.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I want to say that, of course, I realize this is not good legislation, and ordinarily I would certainly oppose it. I have asked the Senator from Pennsylvania to make it apply on its face only to this year, and that has been done. At this late date there might be some inequalities which we have not ironed out; but the amendment provides that the Budget Director and the department shall furnish the next Congress, or the proper committees of the next Congress, with exact details, and hereafter it will not be necessary, of course, to give this additional authority to the department; but for the first year, in view of the action of the committee and of the Senate in agreeing to these reductions, I am rather inclined to think that a provision of this kind would not be improper provisionally.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Tennessee. I think, under the circumstances, this is a very wise provision, and, of course, it applies, as I understand, only to this bill?

Mr. REED. Only to this bill and only for this year.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, in case of a transfer from a larger sum to a smaller sum, does his percentage apply to both?

Mr. REED. Yes; it applies to both. The smaller sum could not be increased more than 15 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the question I wanted to raise. Under the amendment, if there was a large sum in which there could be made a substantial cut, all of it could not be transferred over to a smaller item, could it?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; by no means.

Mr. CONNALLY. To do so would increase the smaller item more than 15 per cent. Now, what I have in mind particularly is this: Under the cut as made here originally the committee took up with the various departments suggestions as to what they would do in the event of these cuts.

In the case of the Bureau of Fisheries, for instance, the department answered back that if we adopted these 10 per cent cuts, they were going absolutely to abandon, I think, about 11 of the Federal fish hatcheries. Some of those hatcheries have been owned by the Government for 30 or 40 years. They own the property, and they have investments. My thought was that if we are going to have elasticity, the matter ought to be sufficiently elastic that the department could not just arbitrarily injure its own service, because to suspend operations entirely in these plants would mean that the property would deteriorate. There ought to be sufficient elasticity so that they could transfer sufficient funds from other appropriations.

In the case of this particular item, suppose the department could properly take an item out of this appropriation and put it in this one, and take another one from that one, and another one from that one, and by trimming a number they could sufficiently build up the appropriation; yet, under the Senator's amendment, no matter how many savings they could accomplish in other places, they could not increase any one item over 15 per cent. That is not elasticity.

Mr. REED. It is only partial elasticity, I confess; but I do not believe we could get Congress to agree to any greater elasticity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I am sure that is the case. So far as the particular bureau he has just mentioned is concerned—the Bureau of Fisheries—of course the department, as long as it has the money to conduct a fish hatchery, has no right to discontinue it, because as yet the Congress still controls the question of whether there shall or shall not be a fish hatchery. On the other hand, by this process it is believed that just such a proposal as the Senator has in mind can be effectuated by the department; and there were considerations of this kind that led me to overcome a rather determined opposition to lump-sum appropriations.

I never have believed in lump-sum appropriations. I do not believe in them now. I think it is unwise legislation to make lump-sum appropriations. At the same time, however, in view of the cuts that are made this late in the year, it does seem to me that there ought to be some leeway. I have so expressed myself to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]; and I think, under the circumstances, it ought to be done.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington, in charge of this bill, a question in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am in sympathy with the amendment. It is only as to the second section of the amendment that I am raising any question. I agree that there ought to be an elasticity whereby the department could allocate these funds, but I do not want to hamstring the department by saying that no one item can be increased more than 15 per cent.

In the view of the Senator from Washington, would this amendment enable the Department of Commerce, in the allocation of these funds, to correct the situation which I called to the attention of the Senate a moment ago with reference to these fish hatcheries?

Mr. JONES. It would be a great deal better than without this amendment. In view of our reduction of 10 per cent under the orders of the Senate, I think this amendment is a very desirable one. I think it will help very much.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. JONES. It may not meet the whole situation. I doubt if it will. As I remember the language of the amendment, it does not allow us to increase a particular item more than 15 per cent.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that, and that is what I was complaining about.

Mr. JONES. That is better than the limitation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, it is better than nothing, of course.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Now, let me ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. The Senator from Tennessee has been leading the fight for these arbitrary reductions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not think they are arbitrary reductions. We make the reductions, not on an arbitrary plan at all but after going over each item and merely reducing the aggregate.

Mr. CONNALLY. I assume whatever opprobrium goes with that term, because I voted with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have had a whole lot of opprobrium, so I am used to it. Go ahead.

Mr. CONNALLY. I take my share, because I voted with the Senator. Knowing his great anxiety to serve the American people by lessening their burdens at this time, I was glad to support his plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it the Senator's view that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will enable the Department of Commerce so to change these figures as to take care of the situation which I mentioned with reference to fish hatcheries?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt whatsoever of it. If I had any doubt about it, I would be perfectly frank to state it to the Senator; but I think it can be done.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point I make is that the department of hatcheries ought not just to abandon properties in which the Government has millions of dollars invested, but rather it ought to lessen its activities at all of these stations, so as to maintain the present organization everywhere. Lessening the activities at all the stations certainly is to be preferred to abandoning plants which in some cases have been under Government control as long as 40 years.

I want to get into the RECORD the views of Senators, so that the department will know that it is to remedy that sort of a situation that we are adopting the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator that I have not a doubt of it. Instead of lessening their activities if they do not have quite so much money to spend, I think it will probably increase their activities and be better for the service. I believe there will be no abandonment of any of the functions of which the Senator has spoken.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was about to say that I do not regard it as any real economy for the Government now to abandon a project temporarily, and then later have to go back and take it up at the expense of much more money than we will save. If, on the other hand, we can take care of the matter by this amendment, I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that I am in hearty accord with the sentiment expressed by the Senator with reference to the plan that should be followed in connection with these various plants.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is, of slowing down activities everywhere?

Mr. JONES. Yes; slowing them down everywhere, rather than abandoning one entirely.

Mr. CONNALLY. Rather than abandoning one at any particular point?

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. And that is the view of the committee?

Mr. JONES. That is my view.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is chairman of the committee. Does he not reflect the views of the committee?

Mr. JONES. That matter was never discussed in the committee, I will say frankly to the Senator; but I agree absolutely with that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, in connection with the discussion relating to the operation of fish hatcheries under the Bureau of Fisheries, the item is found at page 97 of the bill. It was reduced from $986,730 to $886,730, a cut of $100,000, practically 10 per cent, and accordingly was in harmony with the resolution adopted by the Senate directing the committee to cut the total of the bill 10 per cent under the House figures.

In my own State we have a new hatchery, just being completed, at a cost of about $50,000. It is almost ready to be placed in operation. I am told by the Director of the Bureau of Fisheries that under this cut as it now stands that hatchery, although it is completed and fully equipped and ready for operation, can not be placed in service for one year, but that with an additional sum of only $3,000 that hatchery could be placed in operation without delay.

Is it the view of the Senator from Washington, chairman of the committee, that under this amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania funds could be diverted from one branch of a department to another branch of the same department to meet an emergency of that kind?

Mr. JONES. I understand so. I think so. It is thoroughly interchangeable.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I favor the principle involved in the amendment. We are making drastic cuts. I favor making them. Conditions require us to make them. I believe that a provision of this kind would soften the shock and would permit a department to meet the emergencies with less disturbance.

I hope very much that the amendment will be adopted; and I hope, too, that before Congress adjourns we will pass a joint resolution to accord the same privilege to the Department of the Interior. The appropriation bill for that department has passed and been approved and is now a law. It does not contain any such provision as this. I think we should pass a joint resolution giving that department the same privileges that is embodied in the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I hope this amendment will be adopted. None of us wants to make the administration of a department too inconvenient or too difficult.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be all right if the provision were made applicable only to appropriations made this year for the ensuing year, just as is provided here.

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, certainly. I think the privilege should be confined to the particular appropriation bills we are now passing for the next fiscal year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. COSTIGAN and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the amendment. The Chair disregarded at least two Senators who were addressing the Chair for the purpose of having something to say, and proceeded with the vote. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered. Meantime, the Chair has recognized the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, confirming what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] has stated, I hold in my hand responsible protests from Colorado citizens and certain branches of the Izaak Walton League of America, indicating that the appropriation, in the form in which it was reported by the Senate committee, will result in closing important and desirable fish hatcheries in the State of Colorado. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] will be adopted and that the interpretation given to it by the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge, will have the effect of keeping those and similar hatcheries open.

AMERICAN WOMEN AND THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU

While speaking, Mr. President, I desire to add that the Senate has to-day acted on an appropriation for the Children's Bureau, just 20 years after that bureau was created and within the shadows of the lamented death at Rockford, Ill., of our eminent countrywoman, Miss Julia C. Lathrop, who was the first chief of that bureau. It is trebly appropriate to pause to have placed in the RECORD an article on the purposes and work of the Children's Bureau in the last two decades, prepared by Miss Grace Abbott, another of America's most distinguished women.

Miss Abbott succeeded Miss Lathrop as chief of the Children's Bureau in 1921. Her public services, like those of Miss Lathrop and of their brilliant recently deceased coworker, Mrs. Florence Kelley, are rooted in the fine traditions of Hull House, Chicago, over which presides Miss Jane Addams, another American woman of world-wide fame. The bureau is, therefore, a living monument to the public devotion and leadership of noble American womanhood. Miss Abbott's admirable mind, heart, and trained efficiency have won respect and honor, here and abroad, for her and for the humane and humanizing governmental activities she directs.

I trust, Mr. President, that unanimous consent will be given to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, the article by Miss Abbott, which was published in the New York Times of April 10, 1932.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VICTORIES FOR CHILD WELFARE WON IN THE LAST TWO DECADES—DELINQUENCY, EXPLOITATION, AND DEATH RATIOS LOWERED AND HOME RESTORED TO IMPORTANCE SINCE CHILDREN'S BUREAU STARTED

By Grace Abbott

On April 9, 1912, the bill creating the United States Children's Bureau was signed by President Taft. It had been proposed by the first White House Conference on Child Welfare, and President Roosevelt in his message to Congress recommending its passage shortly after the conference said:

"It is not only discreditable to us as a people that there is now no recognized and authoritative source of information upon these subjects relating to child life but in the absence of such information as should be supplied by the Federal Government many abuses have gone unchecked; for public sentiment, with its great corrective power, can only be aroused by full knowledge of the facts."

Three years after this appeal to Congress by President Roosevelt and after President Taft had also recommended its passage, the Children's Bureau, with Julia C. Lathrop as the first chief, began to function as a national center of information, of research and education as to the needs of the whole child and the interrelated problems of health, dependency, delinquency, and the employment of children. The task which was assigned to the Children's Bureau by Congress 20 years ago is not completed. It meets the proverbial description of women's work—it is never done.

There have, however, been important accomplishments in these two decades, of which the following are examples:

In 1912 the birth-registration area had not been established, and facts about even so important a subject as the number of babies that were born or died each year were not available.

In 1932 the United States birth-registration area comprises 46 States and the District of Columbia.

INFANT MORTALITY DECREASED

In 1912 it was estimated that 300,000 babies died during the first year of life. In 1930, in spite of a large increase in population, it was estimated that about 150,000 died. The mother of the 1912 baby was, as a rule, less well prepared to care for him and expert assistance was much more generally available for the 1932 baby. Because his mother knows more about the value of sunlight, of cod-liver oil, and the importance of milk and fruit and vegetables, the child of to-day is much less apt to have rickets and is more frequently a healthy, well-developed child. The 1932 child is much less apt to die of diphtheria and scarlet fever than the 1912 child.

In 1912 there were some 2,000,000 children over 10 and under 16 years of age employed in gainful occupations in the United States (according to the 1910 census, 1,990,225). Complete figures for 1930 are not yet available, but in 44 States and the District of Columbia 609,729 children of these ages were employed. This decrease can not all be considered a permanent gain, however, because unemployment conditions in 1930 affected children as well as adults.

In 1912 only two States had mothers' pensions laws. Now 45 States and the District of Columbia have such laws. In 1912 in a large number of communities delinquent children were tried, convicted, and punished under our criminal laws. Now all but two States have juvenile court laws and 13 have family courts, and organized juvenile court and probation service has been extended from the large cities, where it first originated, to many small towns and rural communities.

In 1912 only one State had a bureau of child health; to-day 47 States have such bureaus. Only one State then had created a bureau of child welfare to promote the interest of dependent, neglected, and delinquent children. To-day more than half the States have such bureaus or divisions of State welfare departments. In 1912 the movement for country-wide health and social services had not been initiated. To-day approximately one-sixth of the counties have adopted organized county plans for health or social service or both.

In 1912 only one State had a State commission for the study of child welfare legislation; since 1912 more than half the States have created child welfare commissions to consider the needs of children, and State legislation relating to children has been coordinated and modernized.

RELATIVE PROGRESS

Progress is, after all, relative. We want to know not only how far the United States has gone in safeguarding childhood but how our gains compare with those of other countries. The general trend of the infant death rate has been downward. It is estimated that in 1912 out of every 1,000 babies born alive 124 died during the first year of life; in 1920 the death rate was 86, and in 1930, 64 in the United States birth-registration area. This is very encouraging until one compares these rates with the rates for New Zealand. In that little island 68 babies out of every 1,000 born alive died in 1910, 51 in 1920, and 34 in 1930. The New Zealand rate in 1930 was lower than the lowest rate for any State. It was 47 per cent lower than the rate for the United States birth-registration area. The irreducible minimum for the United States has not been reached when the death rate in New Zealand is 47 per cent lower than in our own country.

The experience of the United States and of other countries with both higher and lower death rates among babies is that while new scientific discoveries have contributed to the great saving of infant life in the last 20 years, the most important factor has been that the parents of 1932 know more about the scientific care of children than did those of 1912, and they are using more intelligently the knowledge and skill of the physician.

PARENTS AND CHILD CARE

Parents of to-day know more because they are given more and better opportunities to learn the best methods of child care. Less expensive and more practical books giving the general principles of child care are now available and widely used. Free distribution of Government publications is traditional in the United States, but the appropriation of the Children's Bureau has never enabled it to meet the demand for its popular bulletins.

The Superintendent of Documents reports that from the date of their publication to 1932 nearly 2,000,000 of these bulletins have been sold and more than 10,000,000 distributed free.

While child specialists a generation ago were usually called only to care for sick children, to-day many of them are devoting as much as a third of their time to the supervision of well children. The great teaching agency is the child-health center. First started by infant-welfare societies in the larger urban centers, their number has greatly increased in recent years. Centers have been established in many small towns and rural communities with the assistance of the State governments and of the Federal Government from 1921 to 1929. But hardly more than a beginning has been made in making these agencies for parental education available to all mothers.

The change in the community and the parental attitude toward the conduct problems of children is even more marked. The juvenile-court movement was well under way at the beginning of the period which we are reviewing. Both the old conceptions of punishment as a preventive and of "justice" as equality of treatment have died slowly. Under the new legal theory of the juvenile court children are all treated alike only when they are all treated differently. The question is not what should be done for particular types of offenses, but what should be done for individual children. The objective is cure, not punishment.

This is, however, a much more difficult theory to administer. Moreover, if the objective is cure, not punishment, we must make sure that the cure is successful. The attempt to prevent or cure delinquency among children has led to study of physical and mental defects of children, to investigation of their mental and personality problems, to examination of their environments for causes of maladjustment, and to experiment in individual or group training during the preschool period. The first psychiatric clinic for the study of child delinquency, established largely through the efforts of Julia Lathrop, was still regarded as experimental in 1912. There are more than 600 psychiatric and child guidance clinics at the present time.

A review of the research of the last 20 years reveals the abandonment of one "cause" after another which was for a time believed to explain the delinquency of children. We have the beginnings of a new technique.

But if the objective is a scientific approach to the conduct problems of the individual child, necessary resources are still lacking for the study and treatment of the great majority of children who pass through our courts and are committed to correctional institutions. Probation officers, physicians, and psychiatrists attached to juvenile courts, child-guidance clinics, visiting teachers, special schools for truants, and classes in child training for parents are all a result of the effort to cure or to prevent delinquency. Information based on annual reports of the courts is available for 13 cities for the years 1915 to 1927, or for a considerable part of that period. In 10 of these 13 cities the delinquency ratio was lower for the last year reported, and in all but 3 of the 10 the decline was significant.

HOMES KEPT INTACT

In spite of all the criticism that has been leveled at the modern home, its importance in the life of the child is more generally accepted in social treatment to-day than 20 years ago and much more generally than a hundred years ago. On the theory that intelligent and affectionate care of children by their own parents is the greatest safeguard of the future welfare of children, every effort is now being made by the best social agencies to preserve the child's home. The "mothers' pension" laws and the great extension of "home relief" and "family-welfare work" have that objective.

As a result of years of practice in the treatment of dependency there is general agreement among social workers to-day that no child should be removed from his own home or from the custody of his own parents or parent because of poverty or illegitimacy alone. This apparently elementary policy has, in fact, worked a revolution in the social treatment of dependency. Money formerly available to care for children only away from their homes is now used to keep the homes intact.

The most significant change is in the number of dependent children who are now cared for in their own homes. Legislation providing for "mothers' pensions" or "allowances" or "assistance to parents' funds," first enacted in Illinois and Missouri in 1911, has now been enacted in 45 States and in the District of Columbia. In the States enacting such legislation there has also been a steady growth in the total number of families aided, in the amount expended, and in the number of counties giving this type of assistance.

For example, in Wisconsin in 1913 aid was given to 187 familes, and $9,632 was expended in keeping children with their mothers; by 1926, 6,274 families were being assisted and the cost was $1,533,900. Whereas in 1913 in Wisconsin only 5 counties had taken advantage of the permissive mothers' pension law, in 1928 all the counties (71) were using this method of care.

Wisconsin reflects rural conditions. The urban tendency is even more marked. In New York City the mothers' aid expenditures have increased constantly since 1916, the first year the act was in operation. The $165,000 expended that first year had grown to $6,479,000 in 1929. It should, however, be noted that while the general trend is to safeguard the family unit, the progress is not always constant. At this moment the case-working standards of the family-welfare agencies in many cities are practically suspended because of the widespread unemployment and the consequent emergency relief. Homes are being broken up that in other circumstances would be preserved.

EXPLOITATION REDUCED

The struggle to protect children from industrial exploitation began more than a hundred years ago. In each generation opponents have replied to the demand for legal protection that children are a part of the necessary labor supply. Although it is now generally agreed that a full utilization of our capital and adult labor resources produce more than we can at present consume, nearly 2,000,000 children and young persons under 18 years of age were employed in 1930. During that year, in spite of the unprecedented number of unemployed men and women, it is estimated that some 180,000 boys and girls under 16 left school for work.

Great progress has been made in the century and in the last 20 years in reducing the number of child workers by legal enactment and by a change in public opinion. The Child Welfare Conference in 1919 recommended 16 as the minimum school-leaving age. That is the proposal of the White House Conference of 1930. Some 43 States now require that children attend school until they are at least 16 years of age, though many of the laws contain certain exemptions and all except two authorize their release for employment at a specified age below 16 if they have reached certain minimum standards of education and physical fitness, sometimes with the additional requirement that economic necessity must be shown.

A study of the trends of the last 20 years makes clear that a great change is developing in our conceptions of the part our State governments must play in promoting the welfare of children. Prevention is now the keynote in all our social services. Institutional care, for so long the only rôle of the State, is no longer adequate. For a program of prevention a close working relationship between the State agencies and the local community is necessary. The State departments of health and welfare are now assuming a rôle of leadership in establishing well-organized local services.

ENEMIES OF CHILDHOOD

At the present time, however, many of the gains of the past 20 years are threatened. Unemployment and low wages are enemies of childhood. As Julia Lathrop said:

"Children are not safe and happy if their parents are miserable, and parents must be miserable if they can not protect a home against poverty. Let us not deceive ourselves—the power to maintain a decent family living standard is the primary essential of child welfare."

In his opening address to the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection in the autumn of 1930 President Hoover called attention to the estimate of one of the conference committees that there were 6,000,000 improperly nourished children in the United States. That number has increased by leaps and bounds during the last three years. Security in the home is essential for a happy childhood. Security has gone from homes of the millions of unemployed and fear of economic disaster has destroyed it for many others.

The number of children in institutions for dependent children has increased. Adequate budgets for children's agencies are becoming increasingly difficult to secure. But those who have been given community responsibility for the care of children are determined that hard-won gains shall not be lost. State and local White House conferences are charting the needs of children and making plans for future improvement.

The real basis for hope for greater progress in safeguarding the health and general welfare of the children of the United States lies in a growing knowledge of the widespread preventable suffering among children. The peculiar hardships of these last years may quicken our sensitiveness to such suffering and lead to more effective conservation of our greatest national asset.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to ask the author of the amendment as to its application to items that constitute a general appropriation.

The amendment provides that not exceeding 12 per cent may be transferred. I will illustrate. We have a gross appropriation of $2,000,000 for certain given purposes. Under this provision authorizing a transfer of 12 per cent, should the department, in the exercise of that privilege, be allowed to go in and entirely destroy some activity or some project that has been estimated for as a basis for the appropriation? That is the point that occurs to me—that the department might entirely wipe out some enterprise or some project which Congress had intended should be continued.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, at the very most they could reduce only 12 per cent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I know; but they could reduce 12 per cent of the appropriation. We have in the bill here what we might call an omnibus appropriation of $2,000,000 for certain purposes. Within that are items numbering probably a hundred or two hundred, which were estimated for.

Mr. REED. Where does the Senator find that total?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator will find quite a good many such items. I do not recall, just for the moment, the one to which I was referring. I saw one a few moments ago amounting to $2,000,000, but I do not remember what page it was on. I find one here for the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. REED. What page?

Mr. TRAMMELL. On page 86, a total of $2,137,280. I merely turned to that in the bill. What if they decided that they wanted to do away with some activity? I am not thinking of the Bureau of Standards in particular, but that will illustrate. Suppose they want to do away with some activity of the Bureau of Standards entirely. They could, by just one brush of the pen, under this 12 per cent provision, do away with that activity, and that would constitute 12 per cent of the entire appropriation.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; and I am glad the Senator has pointed out that illustration. The figure to which he calls attention is merely the total of the figures occurring in items which stretch over several pages of the bill. It would be impossible, for example, to abolish the hydraulic laboratory research work, which we find provided for at the top of page 85. The appropriation for that is $40,000. That item could not be obliterated. It could be reduced only 12 per cent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think it is a very good idea, of course, to authorize this latitude; and it is probably necessary, making such a sweeping change as we have made; but I did not want the Senate to adopt some amendment which might result in the abandonment of some enterprise which Congress had authorized and which we had had an estimate for and which we do not desire to have discontinued.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator's point is very well taken.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the point, and I want that to be pretty well understood in the RECORD. I call the attention of the Senator to the item of light vessels on page 89, "For salaries and wages of officers and crews of light vessels and lighthouse tenders, including temporary employment when necessary, $2,370,000."

What if, under the exercise of the 12 per cent provision, the Lighthouse Bureau, under the Department of Commerce, should say, "We are going to discontinue certain lights." That is the point I want to guard against.

Mr. REED. Of course I think we could safely depend upon it that the necessary lighthouses are not going to be discontinued. I think there is much more chance that that item will be added to, in order to continue in service a lighthouse, than that it will be reduced.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I just wanted to make it plain that we would not want the department to impair some very necessary service which Congress had contemplated having continued.

In my State I think the alarm is unnecessary, but I have had a good many telegrams and letters to the effect that the word had gone out that they were going to discontinue all the beacon lights on the St. Johns River, which is a navigable waterway extending a long distance, which has been in use for years and years, and is quite an important transportation route.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the adoption of this amendment would certainly add very much to his chances of getting what he desires for his State.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator. It is not a matter of getting anything; it is a matter of maintaining a system of beacon lights which has been in existence for perhaps a half a century or a century, and it would be absolutely destructive to the navigation on that river, for a distance of some 150 or 200 miles, if the department were, under some plan of economy, to discontinue the use of those beacon lights on the St. Johns River. I have had this matter up with the Lighthouse Bureau, and they have assured me that they do not know of anything of the kind in contemplation. I do not know how the alarm got abroad, but a great many people seem to think that there is cause for alarm.

Mr. McKELLAR. It got abroad just as many of the other alarms got abroad; the Cabinet officers are sending out the alarms.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have wanted the matter understood. Of course, I would not want to support some amendment which would result in doing away with a very useful system of lighting such as we have on the St. Johns River. I appreciate, however, the necessity of giving the department some latitude in connection with handling the administration of these appropriations as we have reduced them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida is not more interested in the maintenance of these lighthouses than are all of us on the Gulf. But, as he says, the service has assured him that it has no purpose of abolishing or lessening that service. Is that correct?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is what they told me.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understood the Senator to say that. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, the author of the amendment, if it is his view that his amendment will operate to give the Department of Commerce the power to continue these fish hatcheries which have been referred to, as was disclosed in the debate a moment ago?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; it is my hope and my belief that it will give them just that power.

Mr. CONNALLY. That, along with other things, was the purpose of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. REED. I make the same answer to the Senator that the Senator from Tennessee made with regard to the lighthouses. I think the adoption of the amendment is calculated to assure the maintenance of these important activities, far more than it jeopardizes them.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to have that from the author of the amendment as evidencing the legislative intent.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in this matter, as the Senator from Texas is, and have enjoyed the discussion very much. But I do not think I thoroughly agree that this will have a tendency to prevent the closing down of hatcheries. It might be almost as unfortunate if it resulted in closing them down six months or nine months, as if it resulted in closing them for 12 months in the year. Certainly we can not object to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because it will be helpful to whatever extent it goes. But the Senator from Tennessee assures me that he has no desire to shut down these hatcheries, where it will take only four or five thousand dollars a year to operate them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from South Dakota should not express any fear about it, because it has been developed here in the debate that one of the very purposes of offering this amendment is to maintain these hatcheries.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; but it has not developed that it will maintain them.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the department does not respect the will and the wishes of the Congress, we will know the reason why.

Mr. NORBECK. I am getting to the point, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will not cast any suggestion into the mind of the Department of Commerce that we do not mean exactly what we have been saying we do mean.

Mr. NORBECK. I realize that the Department of Commerce is limited by the provision of the amendment itself to 12 per cent. I want to go farther and suggest that the Senate ought to know, by the time the deficiency bills come before us, whether or not the department is able to keep these hatcheries going, so that we would have opportunity to take care of the item in the deficiency bill. I would like to have the view of the Senator from Tennessee in regard to that matter. Does the Senator think it could be done?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I said before, I take it that there will be ample money to do what has been spoken of here. I have no doubt about it in my own mind at all, and if that money should not be sufficient, of course any Senator will have the right to come before the Committee on Appropriations when we are considering a deficiency bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that when the deficiency bills come in, if it is then apparent that the Bureau of Fisheries has paid no attention to the expressed will of the Congress with reference to this item, it would then be very appropriate to handle the matter by trimming some of the salaries of those who have not respected our wishes.

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly. If we find that under the terms of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania they are not able to keep the fish hatcheries going, we must take up the question of fish hatcheries when a deficiency bill comes before us.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I want to say, in behalf of the Director of the Bureau of Fisheries, that I talked with him at some length about this matter. He assumed a very fair and a very reasonable attitude about it. I do not believe Commissioner O'Malley has any purpose or any desire to harm the system. Quite the contrary. I think he will cooperate to the fullest in administering the system in the very best way he can under the limitations imposed by this bill. We are cutting the appropriation, we are doing it deliberately, and I am in full sympathy with that. I supported the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to recommit the bill with instructions to the Committee on Appropriations to reduce the appropriations 10 per cent, and I expect to adhere to that action in connection with subsequent appropriation bills, unless it be with regard to certain items in the Army and Navy measures.

I believe that the Commissioner of Fisheries will do the very best possible under the cuts we are now imposing upon this bureau. I believe that with the latitude conferred by the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Bureau of Fisheries will find a way to continue operating the hatcheries now in the service, and will put into the service the new ones which have been completed and are now ready to be placed in service. I shall insist that the one in my State be placed in service without delay. It must be done. This amendment provides a method to do so.

I do not want the impression to go abroad that we believe the commissioner, out of any spirit of antagonism or lack of cooperation, will willfully injure the system. I think just the opposite. That should be stated, in fairness to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the item on page 96. The estimate is decreased only $45,000, and it would be the easiest thing in the world, under the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to arrange the matter.

Mr. BRATTON. The item to which I call the Senate's attention is at the top of page 97, which reflects a cut of $100,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Comparatively that is a very small cut, and it could easily be supplied, if the department so willed, to take care of the item in question.

Mr. BRATTON. It can be easily supplied, and I think it will be readily done. That is why I give my support to the amendment, believing that it can be done, and that the commissioner will do it. I have confidence in his judgment and in his good purpose to cooperate with Congress in meeting the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Ohio proposes to insert at the proper place the following:

For the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year Program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for personal services and rent in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, contingent expenses, official cards, printing and binding, purchase of necessary books, documents, and periodicals, camp and field supplies, scientific instruments and equipment, construction of necessary temporary buildings for housing equipment and for observations, hire, maintenance, and operation of passenger-carrying motor vehicles, transportation and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services, and purchase of supplies, materials, and equipment by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, and such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State in furtherance of the project described; and the Secretary of State may transfer this fund, or so much as may be deemed necessary, to the Department of Commerce, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, for direct expenditure by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I crave the attention of every Senator on the floor of the Senate at this moment.

Congress authorized an appropriation of $30,000 for the second polar program. The only one we have had heretofore was 1882. We hope to have the one in 1932, and then there will not be another for 50 years. If we do not participate in this one, then the United States will not have participated in this service for 100 years.

In 1882 the representatives of a group of nations, 26 in number, in the interest of meteorological situations affecting shipping and other activities, met and outlined the first polar program which sent out 14 different expeditions, 12 into the Aretic and 2 into the Antarctic region. The results of the expeditions are well understood. They are altogether scientific and of tremendous value.

In 1929 the representatives of 34 nations met in what is known as the International Meteorological Conference at Copenhagen. They discussed the feasibility of a second polar program. It was unanimously recommended that it be put in operation. The United States decided that it could not afford to stay out of the program. We thought in view of the meteorological, auroral, electric, and other phenomena of the air and sea, the programs which are put on in the interest of all the nations using shipping on the seas ought to have the support of this Nation. A resolution was introduced and adopted without opposition in the House, came over to the Senate and was approved unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was thought to be a proper procedure and we passed it in the Senate with no opposition, granting the authorization recommended by the Geodetic Survey, which stated that it is extremely important and that this Nation ought to be connected with the effort. I assumed the Appropriations Committee overlooked it because some one has failed to call it to their attention. Upon making some investigation I found that it had been presented to the committee. I do not understand on what basis the authorization for $30,000 for this work is ignored by the Committee on Appropriations. It means that in their judgment this is not an important service.

Let me read a brief statement:

In the First International Polar Year Program, from August, 1882, to August, 1883, 14 expeditions were sent to the field, 12 in the Arctic and 2 in the Antarctic, by 12 different countries, fully equipped for comprehensive meteorological observations. The United States took part in this program, establishing stations at Point Barrow, Alaska, and Fort Conger (Lady Franklin Bay), Ellesmere Island.

The International Meteorological Conference held at Copenhagen in September, 1929, with representatives from 34 countries present, proposed a Second International Polar Year Program, which found stimulus in the many new problems that have arisen during the past 50 years requiring additional data for their solution. During the second polar year period, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933, it is intended that a number of observation stations in the Arctic and Antarctic regions will be operated for observing and recording magnetic, electric, auroral, and meteorological phenomena during that period according to an internationally concerted schedule. The United States will establish a station near Fairbanks, Alaska, a point accessible at all times of the year by steamer and railway. Twenty-six of the countries represented at the international meteorological organization have made favorable replies regarding the proposed program.

I scarcely think it credible that the Members of the Senate look upon this enterprise as of so little value that they will say the United States shall not participate in the program. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has just suggested to me sotto voce that no one will oppose it. The fact is it has been left out of the report of the Committee on Appropriations. I am of the opinion that no one can afford to oppose it, but I am wondering just what it means. I offer the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Appropriations Committee did not overlook the matter. It was given very careful attention in the committee under the conditions which confront us to-day. The subcommittee, I may say, recommended $20,000 for the purpose; but, when it came to the full committee, the item was stricken out altogether before there was any order made by the Senate with reference to a 10 per cent cut. After the Senate made its order that we must cut 10 per cent below the House figures, of course, we could not put the item back in the bill.

If the Senate should vote this $30,000, it would mean about $27,000 or $28,000 above the amount we were permitted to report under the 10 per cent cut order of the Senate. In other words, the bill now carries about $1,400 less than the limit allowed by the 10 per cent cut. If the Senate sees fit to add this item to the bill, it will carry it $27,000 or $28,000 above its 10 per cent cut order to the committee.

As I said, the subcommittee recommended $20,000; but the full committee, before the Senate gave the order to cut 10 per cent, struck out the item entirely. There is no good that has come to us from the observations of 50 years ago, and there will be none coming from another observation, in my opinion.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, does the Senator say no good has come out of it?

Mr. JONES. There has been no particular good pointed out and no substantial benefit indicated.

Mr. FESS. I should like to submit to the Senator himself a report which was made on the first polar program and he certainly will not say then that no good has come out of it.

Mr. JONES. I have not any doubt about the scientific reports that would probably be made to scientists, and so forth, but I have not seen any indication of any particular good that can be traced back to the observation of 50 years ago.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the Senator a question. I recognize the stress under which the Senator is operating. He can not make me believe that he thinks there is no value coming out of this work. I recognize why he is taking the position he does, and I can not criticize him for it; but I would like to keep the way open so that the conferees at least can provide for this second polar program.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that some item covering the matter could be put in the deficiency appropriation bill, which will be acted upon, of course, before the session is over. To add $30,000 to the bill by this item is for the Senate to act directly contrary to the orders which it gave the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FESS. What position would the Senate be in if I asked for an amendment to the amount, recognizing that it is not enough and would amount to nothing? It would leave open the way for the conference to take care of the matter.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will amend his amendment by making it $1,000, it would be within the 10 per cent cut ordered heretofore by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will take that course, or wait until the deficiency appropriation bill comes in, then the matter may be taken care of. I hope he will not upset the plan of the Senate. I have sympathy with the proposal of the Senator from Ohio. The Committee on Appropriations turned down the item long before the bill was recommitted; and yet, as I said to the Senator, I have some sympathy with the proposal. I would like to look into it more carefully, and I hope the Senator will take the course which has been suggested by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FESS. The only difficulty would be that it would appear that the judgment of the Senator from Ohio might be that $1,000 would be sufficient to do the work, and that would be an outrageous suggestion.

Mr. JONES. It is perfectly clear that $1,000 is not enough to do the work if it is going to be done at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me that under the peculiar circumstances that is the course for the Senator from Ohio to take. We are in a bad situation. Let us not complicate it further, but let us see what we can do.

Mr. FESS. My opinion is that it would be very bad psychology for me to do that, and I am willing to let my amendment come to a vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have the greatest sympathy for what the Senator from Ohio is seeking to do, and I shall vote for the amendment he has offered; but I do think that the reflections which he made upon the Appropriations Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, were not justified.

I would like for the sake of the RECORD to call attention to the fact that a number of very important things have been entirely left out of this bill. For instance, an item for the next Pan American conference, which is to be held at Montevideo, Uruguay, and which will be attended by all the countries of the Western Hemisphere, for which an appropriation of $80,000 was provided by the House, has been entirely left out of the bill. It was not the intention of the committee that this action should be any reflection upon that conference or upon the importance of "getting together" with our neighbors on the south. It was merely thought that in these days and under the order of the Senate they ought to cut out the item.

Another very serious cut has been made in connection with the airways. The lighted airways, under the bill as reported by the committee, will have to be reduced. The remark has been made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] about beacons on the St. Johns River being possibly cut out. I hope under the amendment to which we just agreed, offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], that will be avoided. But under the provisions of the bill as it has been reported nearly 2,000 miles of lighted airways will have to be put out of commission because money is not provided for their maintenance. A number of radio operators giving weather reports to aviators as they fly will lose their jobs and their offices will be closed. Lights along about 1,700 miles of airways can no longer be maintained under the bill. It is a very serious situation. It means that pilots flying the mail over these airways will either have to risk their lives by flying in the dark or have to cease operations entirely. That is the kind of thing that has been done in the reporting of the bill. Therefore it does not seem to me the Senator from Ohio is quite fair in the reflections which he made upon the committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. FESS. If any suggestion I made was unfair, I withdraw it. What I was concerned about was that I supposed no one had appeared before the committee in connection with the matter; and although an authorization had been granted, the item was omitted anyway. That was the understanding under which I was laboring.

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be glad to vote for the Senator's amendment, and I only wish we might have had some money for the Pan American conference, but both items were stricken out entirely.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there may be some difference of opinion about it, but in my judgment every item cut out of the bill after the 10 per cent order was made was more important even than this one. The question is whether or not we are going to restore this one item and leave all the other items out of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call for a division.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that a few days ago I gave notice of my intention to submit a motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of offering an amendment for the consolidation of the International Water Commission, United States and Mexico, with the American section of the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the American section, International Water Commission, United States and Mexico, is hereby consolidated with the American section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico. Hereafter the powers, duties, and functions of such section of such commission shall be exercised by the American section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico.

All records, files, and property of any nature whatsoever (including office equipment) of, and that portion of the unexpended appropriations less $25,000 for the American section of the International Water Commission, United States and Mexico, for the fiscal year 1931–32, are transferred to the American section, International Boundary Commission, and said appropriations shall be immediately available for direct expenditure by the American section, International Boundary Commission, under the direction of the commissioner thereof, and shall continue to be so available until June 30, 1933. The commissioner is authorized to appoint to positions in the American section, International Boundary Commission, such employees of the American section, International Water Commission, or other persons as he may deem necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act, and said commissioner is further authorized to designate and redesignate, as he may determine to be necessary, the duties and headquarters station of all employees under his supervision.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the amendment, of course, is subject to a point of order. For that reason, as I understand, the Senator, as he has stated, gave notice that he would move to-day, or when the proper time came, to suspend the rule in order that he might offer the amendment. I myself am perfectly satisfied with the amendment. It will work along economical lines.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What would the saving be?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember the exact amount, but the adoption of the amendment will result in an economy; it will save some money; and I am perfectly willing for the Senator from Texas to make his motion to suspend the rule, pursuant to the notice given by him, and I am perfectly willing to have the vote taken on that motion without any roll call. Then, if the rule shall be suspended, he may offer his amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I move to suspend the rule in order that I may offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No point of order has been made as yet against the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order that what the Senator from Texas desires may be done, I make the point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY. I made the motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Washington, who wants to save his face on points of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order that there may not be any doubt about it, I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CONNALLY. I now move to suspend the rule pursuant to the notice which I gave.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice submitted by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the notice to suspend the rule submitted by Mr. CONNALLY on the 22d instant.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the notice is the regular form provided for the purpose, and I suggest that the reading of it be waived.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let it be put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice will be printed in the RECORD.

The notice referred to is as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz, on page 16, after line 12, insert the following——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been read.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not care to debate the amendment, but several Senators desire me to explain it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest that the question on suspending the rules may be put, and then the amendment may be debated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to suspend the rules in order that the amendment may be offered. [Putting the question.]

There being no adverse vote, more than two-thirds of the Senate voting in the affirmative, the motion is agreed to, and the rule is suspended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Texas now explain his amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators that we now have two international commissions that deal with matters between the United States and Mexico. One of them is the American section of the United States-Mexican Boundary Commission and the other is the International Water Commission. At present the same man represents the United States on both commissions; he is American boundary commissioner and also American water commissioner. The purpose of this amendment is to consolidate his forces into one office. It will save the Government money; it will eliminate some of the machinery. I can not tell the Senate just how much it will save, but there is a limitation in line 3, page 2, which provides a saving of $25,000. In other words, the pending bill makes available all the unexpended balance; this amendment makes available all the unexpended balance less $25,000. So the amendment, if adopted, will save the Government at least $25,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the salary of the commissioner an annual salary for each position or is he paid on a per diem basis?

Mr. CONNALLY. He draws only one salary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. For both positions?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; for both positions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But it will result in the saving of some money?

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand, it will save at least $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask for the adoption of an amendment which does not call for an additional appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 30, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

ONE THOUSANDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE NATIONAL PARLIAMENT OF ICELAND

The unexpended balance of $3,173.75 of the appropriation of $55,000 contained in the joint resolution approved January 20, 1930 (46 Stat. 57), for the expenses of participation by the United States in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Alting, the National Parliament of Iceland, is continued available until June 30, 1933, for the same purposes, and for the transportation and subsistence or per diem in lieu thereof (notwithstanding the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto) of a representative or representatives of the Government of the United States to make the formal presentation of the statue of Leif Ericsson, including such expenses of entertainment as the Secretary of State shall deem proper.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is an unexpended balance of about $3,000 available, which, under the amendment, is continued. The amendment does not increase the amount appropriated in the bill, and so I do not have any objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in order that there may be an amendment before us which may be debated, I move, on page 63, line 17, to strike out "$670,000" and insert "$725,000."

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order against the amendment that the committee amendment at that point has already been agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want it understood by all Senators that when we talk here about the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and of which I heartily approve, and think we are going to find money in this already emasculated bill to establish fish-cultural stations and other activities, there will be cruel awakenings. It is all right to have the RECORD show that the appeal was made and the hope expressed that such things might be accomplished, but, of course, they will not be, because there is not money enough in the bill to take care of all these activities, no matter how desirable.

As is well understood, I am here to say one further and probably the last word about the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. This morning I received a telegram from Buffalo. That city is interested in this matter, because if this bill shall pass as it is now before us, the office of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce there, as well as offices in 18 other places in this country, will be abolished; they will no longer exist.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will state to the Senator that I have received similar protests from my State against the possible abolition of some of these offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for the confirmation of my fear. The telegram to which I refer is from the president of the Buffalo Exporters' Association, and no doubt it accords with similar telegrams received by the Senator from Massachusetts. It reads:

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 29, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Appreciate your effort opposing discontinuance Buffalo district office Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Our organization, which consists leading exporters of Buffalo, urge you and associates continue efforts. Local office performs indispensable service required by large and small firms alike throughout western New York. Removal of services now would seriously retard rapidly growing export trade from this area.

E. A. FORSYTHE,
President Buffalo Exporters' Association.

Mr. President, I have not before me at the moment the list which was presented here the other day by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] covering 18 or 20 offices in different parts of the country that will be closed if this bill shall become a law as it now stands in the text before us to-day.

Let me call attention to what is going to happen if the Treasury and Post Office bill should pass as it will have to be written under similar instructions given by the Senate to the committee. It will abolish customs offices in Indiana, Iowa, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Kentucky, Tennessee, Nebraska, Missouri, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, California, Rhode Island; Rochester, N. Y.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Mobile, Ala.; Hartford, Conn.; Ohio, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Maryland, Georgia, Illinois, Virginia, Michigan, and Washington.

Mr. President, I invited the Commerce Department to give me certain information, and I have that information. I suppose that the Department of Commerce will be criticized, but I asked for this information, and it is perfectly proper for an official of the Government to give information if a Member of Congress asks him for it.

The other day the Senator from Tennessee called the attention of the Senate, after the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and I had made our representations, in regard to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to the increased appropriations for it in various years beginning with 1921. He pointed out that in 1921 the appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce amounted to $1,211,000; the next year, $1,694,000; then $2,568,000; and so on from year to year, until the present year they have reached the sum of $5,000,000.

I concede that, Mr. President. The record is accurate. The statement of the Senator from Tennessee is correct. It is true that the appropriations for this bureau have increased from year to year until now they are at least four times as much as they were 10 years ago.

That does seem like an enormous increase in appropriations. The casual examiner might regard this is a wasteful use of money and a strange increase in appropriations. But let me show you what has happened.

The purpose of this bureau is to aid manufacturers, farmers, and all producers in this country to find markets abroad for what they have produced here. It is exactly as if a man had a manufactory of furniture, and in order that he might sell his furniture he established showrooms in foreign cities and sent out salesmen to attempt to sell the products of his endeavor.

This bureau has operated in two ways. Through its foreign agencies it has received applications from concerns, establishments, and individuals in Europe stating that a given applicant desired to become the distributor of American automobiles or typewriters or any other kind of factory product, or farm product or foodstuff. Such applications have been brought to the attention of American producers by the foreign offices. The applications have been stimulated by the activities of the agents of the department in foreign lands.

Likewise the local offices in this country have made studies of the various manufacturing and agricultural establishments and institutions and industries in the territories round about the local offices. Perhaps to the local office has gone the man who makes a certain type of shoes or of clothing or of shirts or collars, whatever it may be. This manufacturer has said, "I want to find a market somewhere in the world for these products of mine." By the cooperation of these domestic and foreign offices there have been brought together those on the other side who can use our products and those on our side who make the products.

Let me tell you how popular that has been with our people.

In 1921 and 1922, when the appropriation for this bureau was only $1,211,000, there were 506,000 individual services rendered. That is, 506,000 applications were made by individual concerns for aid in the distribution of their wares. The cost per service then was $2.38.

See how the popularity of this service has increased. See how many more applications have been made for service. It is startling how the demands have grown.

There were 506,000 applications in 1921. By 1923 the number had increased to more than a million—1,169,000. The next year there were 2,000,000 applications. By 1928 the individual services demanded had increased to 3,342,000, and this year 4,000,000 have asked for this service. So, if we take the cost per service, where it was $2.38 10 years ago it has decreased to $1.28 to-day.

There has been that decrease in the cost of individual service because of the demands made upon this bureau. Think of it, Senators! Four million institutions or individuals in this country have made use of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce during the past year—4,000,000!

During the past year the bureau has succeeded in establishing 2,873 new agencies and sales connections for American firms as a result of its services. Nearly 3,000 agencies in America made connections with European establishments in order that their sales might be extended by reason of that export service.

During the past year 942,580 trade opportunities were brought to the attention of American exporters. Nearly a million trade opportunities in Europe were brought to the attention of American exporters through the operation of this bureau. Listen to these figures——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. That I might not disturb the presentation of this important question by an independent speech, I take the liberty of offering to the able Senator from New York the full information sent me from my city of Chicago, where the Association of Commerce and the officers of the Continental-Commercial National Bank protest against the omission of this item of appropriation for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce on the ground, as they contend, that under the previous system of things the consul represented commerce and to some extent became its advocate, but that now, since we have passed a law that merges the consul into an office where he may any day expect to be made a secretary of legation and therefore a diplomatic officer, he will not deign any further to represent commerce; and therefore we have no representation whatever, as we previously had, by virtue of the new epaulets that have been adjusted to the consul, shifting him into the possibility of a diplomatic career, for which he hopes by day and of which he dreams by night.

Therefore, unless these offices, which are some form of an adjunct to commerce, are in some degree continued, it is represented to me, to bring forth to this honorable body, there would be no one whosoever throughout our European commercial ports to speak in behalf of American commerce.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. That bears directly upon the argument I intended to make. What the Senator from Illinois has said so well gives emphasis to my plea.

Let me state that last year we received in this country $57,000,000 in new business, secured for American concerns by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. That was done at an expense of $5,000,000. We received $11 for every dollar we invested. The estimate is that there will be a return of one million and a half dollars in income taxes this year on that same investment of $5,000,000.

Mr. President, it stands to reason that to destroy this bureau is to threaten the life of the American export business. I can not conceive it possible that the Senate of the United States would wish to be a party to that calamity.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator permit me to comment on the observation offered by the Senator from Illinois, which at least in some degree must be an inadvertence? The Consular Service of the State Department not only continues to deal in trade reports upon a very substantial basis, it not only continues to make trade contacts, which are reported at a total of $19,000,000 in net advantage to American concerns during the past year, but, in addition, the Consular Service of the State Department, continuing its trade function which it monopolized for so many years, is entirely depended upon by the foreign service of the Commerce Department to formulate the World Trade Directory, which is virtually the Dun & Bradstreet's of the world, involving contacts with 585,000 different foreign firms.

The suggestion I am taking the liberty of submitting, both to the Senator from New York and to the Senator from Illinois, is that there might well be a study to determine whether both of these relatively competitive agencies in the foreign field might not well come to a common basis and be stabilized and unified, so that in all of these respects we have but one spokesmanship beyond our borders.

I thank the Senator for permitting me to make that observation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to pardon me for making an observation to my esteemed friend from Michigan, to say that as I can not speak of knowledge I can only give the report that the consuls, as the Senator says, make a mathematical and something of a historical report, but the report they make as consuls is gathered from the work done by these commercial individuals of whom the Senator from New York has been speaking; and while the consul assumes to make the report and to take, perchance, the credit of the result, his is but the report of the labors of others, and he has a right officially to present them as the consul. But my eminent friend the distinguished Senator from Michigan fails to observe that it is the report of the consul of what has been done, without any reference or statement of who did it. It is claimed by those who report to me that it is the commercial officials who do it, and the consul merely makes the report of the consequence and the result. I do not know how true that is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Illinois will readily see that he is describing a precise type of competition which should not exist. If it does exist, as he indicates, that is one more reason why in this economy program the sensible thing to undertake is to consolidate the competing forces of the Government, and thus seek increased efficiency at reduced cost.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, how long would the diplomatic agent abroad have any diplomatic standing if he were using his office to develop business for the United States?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, our consuls abroad, although they are Foreign Service officers, are not considered to be diplomatic officers.

Mr. COPELAND. Nevertheless their work to a great extent is along diplomatic lines. My contention is that if we desire to continue our export business, which even in 1931 was two and a half billion dollars, the largest industry of America, next to agriculture, if we desire to continue that export business and to increase that export business we must have agents on the other side who are devoted to that one thing and nothing else. They should not be diverted at all by the diplomatic activities which are incumbent upon a consul in a foreign country.

Mr. President, I take it the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois is well founded, and certainly his view is the experience and the belief of every export concern I know of in this country. They are begging everywhere that this activity may be continued, in order that this foreign business may be brought to us.

In connection with our export trade, which I have spoken of as, next to agriculture, the chief business of America, there are 1,400,000 workers. More than a billion and a half dollars in wages are paid to the persons engaged in making goods for export trade.

Mr. President, I call attention to this further fact: Great Britain and Canada spend more per capita on export-trade production than the United States spends. Great Britain cut expenses 11 per cent as an economy measure, but did not curtail the expense of activities along this particular line. She made cuts in higher salaries and allowances, but no effort was made to reduce the activities of the British agents developing business for British industries.

I ask that the statement of the facts I have before me regarding the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, given to me by the department by request, and also page 3 of the little pamphlet I hold in my hand, which show the relation of the cost of appropriations to the service rendered, be included at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME FACTS REGARDING BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

Two thousand eight hundred and seventy-three new agency and sales connections made by American firms last year as a result of the bureau's services can be valued at $500 to $1,000 each.

One hundred and ninety-three thousand five hundred sales-information reports distributed annually. Worth $1 each at least.

Seven hundred and thirty-one thousand five hundred and two trade lists distributed.

Nine hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and eighty trade opportunities brought to attention of American exporters.

Fifty-seven million dollars in new business secured for American concerns by bureau last year. Bureau spent $5,000,000; $11 return for each $1 invested.

One million five hundred thousand dollars estimated income tax on above business.

Two billion five hundred million dollars export trade 1931. Largest industry next to agriculture.

United States leads the world as an exporter despite decline.

One million four hundred thousand workers involved in export trade with more than one and one-half billion dollars in wages.

Nineteen hundred and thirty-one exports declined 37 per cent in value over 1930, imports 32 per cent; on quantity basis much less severe, exports only 20 per cent, imports 10 per cent over 1930. Industrial production fell off 16 per cent; freight-car loadings 19 per cent.

Twenty-five billion dollars in commercial transactions as result of export trade.

Seven million dollars collected annually by Department of Commerce in fees and turned into Treasury.

Twenty-four thousand export firms served currently by bureau.

Forty-six thousand firms make daily use of bureau's domestic trade services.

One hundred thousand dollars' worth of bureau publications sold annually.

Eighty per cent of bureau's services for "little fellow."

Three million nine hundred and sixty-six thousand services rendered by bureau during 1930–31.

Cost per service dropped from $2.38 in 1921–22 to $1.28 in 1930–31.

Appropriations 1930–31 four times 1921–22. Services eight times.

One and one-tenth per cent of total United States Budget for Department of Commerce.

Eleven per cent of total for Department of Commerce for Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Great Britain and Canada spend more per capita on export-trade promotion than United States. Great Britain cut expenses 11 per cent as an economy measure but did not curtail staff or activities. It was applied to cuts in higher salaries and allowances.

One million five hundred thousand dollars contributed by industry for cooperative work with bureau, i. e., Drug Store Survey, 31 trade associations put up $75,000, bureau $25,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, this is the one hundred and forty-third anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States. The situation is not such that I can state what I wanted to say earlier in the day, but I wish to take the privilege on Monday of inserting in the RECORD some very interesting letters of notable contemporaries of George Washington.

I thank the Senator from New York for allowing me to make this announcement.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator made the announcement. If George Washington, with his breadth of vision, were alive to-day and here to advise us, I am sure he would be urging us not to make any entangling political alliances with Europe but to get all the business possible from the European countries.

Mr. President, I beg all Senators to give thought to what I have said. I know it is as useless as baying at the moon to make any effort to change the pending bill. It is predestined and foreordained to pass as it has been written. But I do hope that these feeble remarks of mine may be of some use when we come to the conference, and that possibly from the conference may come more liberal support for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

I do not flatter myself that the amendment presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which I fully approved, will in any material way increase the activity of this bureau. But in this time of economic depression in America, American industry and American activities of every sort must be encouraged. Yet by the passage of this bill we are aiding the depression, taking the heart still further from those engaged in business in our country. I am regretful beyond words that it seems necessary that there should be any such economy as this; it is false economy, not true economy.

There are many activities of the Government which can be reduced so far as their appropriations are concerned; but when we do anything to interfere with the spinning of the wheels of the machines in our factories, and the belching of smoke from the chimneys of our factories, we are harming our country. It is the exercise of false economy, which will come back to haunt us.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, following the speech of the Senator from New York, some communications which I have received similar to that offered by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 11, 1932.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Although believing firmly in governmental economy hope nothing will be done which will cripple the valuable service given by Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

EDWIN S. SMITH,
Commissioner of Labor and Industries.

BOSTON, MASS., April 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

The New England Shoe and Leather Association and our manufacturers generally, while believing there is abundant opportunity to eliminate unnecessary activities in most departments of the Federal Government, would be sorry to see any action taken by Congress that would seriously cripple the vital activities of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in its cooperative work with American business.

THOMAS F. ANDERSON, Secretary.

BOSTON, MASS., April 12, 1932.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

While thoroughly in accord with increased Government economy hope you will use all your influence to prevent any panicky action that would cripple Commerce Department; although cost of this department minor factor in Government Budget it is doing wonderful job for American business. Any setback here would be dearly purchased economy.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BLUE PRINT AND ALLIED INDUSTRIES, PHILIP B. TERRY, Vice President.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., April 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Reduction to expenses Government agencies heartily indorsed, but we hope in the case of Department of Commerce reduction will not be so drastic as to eliminate eastern district offices believed to be rendering important service to industry.

SPRINGFIELD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Understand Senate contemplating reducing appropriation available Bureau Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Respectfully urge you refuse reduce their already small appropriation still further.

C. A. RICHARDS,
President C. A. Richards (Inc.),
Export Distributors for United American
Bosch Corporation, Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON, MASS., April 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

While I believe strongly in economy and all possible reduction of expense, it seems to me that the proposed reduction in appropriation for Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is relatively excessive and will seriously cripple the good work being done. I commend the matter to your careful consideration.

FRANKLIN W. HOBBS.

NEW ENGLAND COUNCIL,
Boston, Mass., April 16, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Being in position to know the nature and value of the work of the New England office of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, we have to-day telegraphed certain Senators as follows with reference to the Department of Commerce appropriation bill now pending:

"While New England industry and business generally earnestly desire balancing of the Federal Budget and look to the Congress to achieve this as promptly as possible, we urge that provision be made for continuance of district offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce on a basis that will not entirely deprive business of the practical and valuable assistance they render."

This telegram was sent to Hon. REED SMOOT, chairman Finance Committee; Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, chairman Appropriations Committee; Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, chairman Commerce Committee; Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, chairman Committee on Manufactures.

Sincerely yours,

DUDLEY HARMON,
Executive Vice President.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have been reading with a great deal of interest the comment that is emanating from Washington relative to the colossal task that is now confronting you gentlemen in the balancing of the National Budget. I thoroughly realize that you are bombarded from all angles with suggestions as to what you should do and what you should not do, and in sending you the word I am now sending, I do so with the sole thought in mind of possibly being helpful in offering information as to something I come in personal contact with practically every day in the week.

I am particularly concerned with the rather drastic cut that is contemplated in the provision for district and cooperative offices of the Department of Commerce. To the merchants of the country these offices have been of distinct value, and I think I am fairly safe in saying that they render more dollar for dollar value than any other governmental activity.

Their business is strictly in the promotion of American trade, both domestic and foreign, and in coming in contact with both domestic and foreign trade, such as I do in my business every day, I have come to look on the district office in Boston as an absolute essential to the proper conduct of trade. As an instance of the value of the district office in Boston, changes are taking place almost momentarily in regulations made by foreign countries as to what they will or will not admit into their country, whether or not the government of any particularly country will allow funds to go out in payment for American goods, changes in rates of duties and what not, all of which information the district office of the Department of Commerce keeps on file for immediate reference, and I very much fear should this service be too seriously curtailed it would work a real hardship on manufacturers in this district, attempting to properly conduct their trade abroad.

For instance, it has not been so long ago that one of our clients was sending a rather large order to Chile. Before letting the order go out, we checked up with the Boston district office of the Department of Commerce and discovered that the Chilean Government had put in a regulation whereby the consignee in Chile could only secure the permission of his government to pay the invoice on this merchandise at the rate of 2 per cent per month, and that if the shipper had made the shipment, he would have had to wait two years for his money. When I got this information, he decided not to ship, and it was a distinct saving of time and money to have such information available.

Of course, it could be said that such information could be obtainable from Washington if there were no such thing as a district office in Boston, and it is probably true, but it is much more convenient, and, in my humble opinion, much more economic that such information be readily available for people in a particular district rather than have to go to Washington for every bit of information that is needed.

As I started out to say in the beginning of this letter, I do not want to take the position of "viewing things with alarm" or burdening you with personal suggestions, but I think you would find on a check up that the sentiments I have set forth in this letter as to the real usefulness of some of the efforts of the Department of Commerce will be agreed to by practically all manufacturers and shippers in the New England district.

This letter is written with the idea of putting information in your hands as to the practical usefulness of something that should be retained if it is at all possible to do so and consistent with the attitude you are taking in regard to the momentous question that is placed on you to decide.

With cordial good wishes, I am

Very sincerely yours,

D. C. ANDREWS & CO.

HONORED SIR: Am inclosing an editorial from the Telegram regarding the work of the Commerce Department at Boston that might be interesting.

Respectfully,

Editor Telegram-Sun.

[From the Lawrence Telegram, April 21, 1932]

AS WE SEE IT

After all, have you ever realized the personal service the Federal Government gives to its citizens? As a general rule we consider Washington too far away to be of interest except once in four years, when the President is elected, and occasionally when some discussion is up in Congress in which we are interested. As far as personal service is concerned, very few people realize there is any such animal. But some people have discovered the difference. Suppose you wanted to ship a Christmas present to some friend in another country. How would you learn of the procedure to send it and whether there is a duty to pay? Some time ago a man wanted to send a piano to his son in Italy. The son preferred an American make and the father desired him to have it. There are a large number of such nice and interesting questions that puzzle the people here, and many of them let the question slip because they do not know how to secure the information.

Washington is too far away, there is too much trouble to write, and no one would pay attention to a question anyway. That is the reaction of the average citizen. But you would be surprised to know that up in the tower of the customhouse in Boston there are offices that are busy every day answering simple questions, but questions of real interest, sometimes vital interest, to the one asking them. Some of these questions require patience, but they are answered by the Department of Commerce representatives.

While talking with an official there recently the phone rang. Only part of the conversation was heard in the office, but apparently the question was answered more readily than the inquirer expected. The inquirer desired to ship something to Canada and wanted to know the duty he would have to pay. Instantly the answer went back over the wires: "The duty will be 35 per cent, plus an excise tax of 6 per cent and a sales tax of 3 per cent." How could the man in the customhouse tower be so sure? He laughed and said he had answered the same question a dozen times that day. And there are plenty other questions.

A man came in who planned to move to Canada. He wanted to know about duty on the property he desired to take and about an automobile. It took less than five minutes for him to learn that his personal property was not dutiable, but there was a question regarding the auto. If he had owned it six months, there was no duty. He was planning to buy an auto. Well, in that case it could not be a secondhand car, for they are not admissible for settlers, and a new car is subject to duty, plus excise, plus sales tax.

Of course, people and firms in trade understand the great service rendered by this department regarding conditions throughout the world. So complete is the information that there is no trouble to learn of markets in far-off Australia, China, or New Zealand. Department agents throughout the world gather this data for the benefit of the American manufacturer. As the same time, it is gathering a vast amount of information for any citizen who can use that information to advantage.

There are able men who are devoting their time and energy in assisting American industries on the road to prosperity. The prospect of trade expansion, building better local markets, the understanding of the market for the special product of the firm, and a score of others dealing with the intimate business in which a particular firm is engaged. Many a puzzling problem to a new, and often established, firm is solved through the aid of the department.

Possibly there is no more valuable service to the people of this country than that freely given by the Department of Commerce. During this period of world depression the department is of valuable service in advising manufacturers and shippers in their many problems. In fact, this department can be of still greater service with more able and experienced men at its disposal. It is in reality one Government service that is established to aid our industry and trade through such periods as we are passing, and do it safely.

It would naturally seem that, at the present moment, the department is of more importance than at any time of its existence. Foreign trade is important, but it must be safe and productive. Not only the major industries but there are many, many ways in which it helps the little industry; the one just beginning. It works on the theory that there are experiences that can be of value to the man just starting or developing a manufacturing plant. There are the vital questions of market, appropriation of effort and finance, and others, which may mean the difference between success or failure of the enterprise.

It would appear reasonable to presume that the best course for the Government, at this time, is to expand the service of this one department, because of the immense assistance it can be to our depressed industry. Our business men do not require so much help during prosperity. It is then that most any business runs itself. But, it is in times like these that greater effort on the part of the Government should be made to encourage and promote, through proper advice and experience, all industry.

Perhaps you do not know it, but there are services offered by the Federal Government that have the personal touch for every citizen of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on its second reading and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be offered, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MEMORIAL

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial, signed by Franklin Reece, the Reece Buttonhole Machine Co., and sundry citizens (being manufacturers) of Boston, Mass., protesting against abandonment of the general manufacturers' sales tax in the pending tax bill and indorsing the economy program, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TAX ON IMPORTED WOOD PULP

Mr. HASTINGS presented a telegram from the Jessup & Moore Paper Co., of Wilmington, Del., favoring the imposition of a tax on imported wood pulp, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILMINGTON, DEL., April 30, 1932.

Hon. DANIEL O. HASTINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand some doubt whether Finance Committee will recommend tax on imported wood pulp to offset depreciated currency foreign nations off gold standard. Foreign pulp now delivered in this country much less cost than domestic manufacture. We have been obliged shut down our Maryland pulp mill indefinitely. Unless some relief is given immediately we must close our Delaware pulp mill employing several hundred men. Our Delaware mill operating only two days a week. Our former customers buying foreign pulp at low prices. If our pulp mills shut down permanently the farmers and producers in Delaware will have no market for pulpwood. Please confer with Senator JONES and try to help us.

THE JESSUP & MOORE PAPER CO.

SUPREME COURT OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Manila High Court Ceases to Function," and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the request that they hasten consideration of the nominations of judges for the Philippine high court.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANILA HIGH COURT CEASES TO FUNCTION—WASHINGTON SENATE'S FAILURE TO CONFIRM SIX APPOINTEES LEAVES QUORUM LACKING—TRIBUNAL TO BE ENLARGED—TWO OF THE ORIGINAL NINE RECENTLY RESIGNED AND ONE DIED—ONE APPOINTEE OPPOSED

MANILA, April 29.—The Philippines were left to-day without a functioning supreme court.

The complication, which had been foreseen as a result of the failure of the Senate in Washington to confirm the new appointees, was precipitated when the court held its final session under its old organization with a membership of nine.

The death of Justice Charles Johns and the resignations of Justices Findlay Johnston and Norberto Romualdez left the court only seven members, one of whom is Acting Justice Carlos Imperial, who is filling the vacancy created by the death of Justice Johns.

Justice Ostrand was on a vacation in the United States, thus leaving the strength for the summer session at five.

The present impasse arose as a result of the legislature's action last year in raising the membership to 15. The supreme court is the only appellate body in the islands and was hopelessly overworked.

The first six appointments to fill these places were allowed to lapse in the Senate because of political pressure. Three new appointments were made recently, but confirmation of these also failed.

The court must take an enforced recess until July, since it now requires nine for a quorum, and unless the appointments are confirmed in the meantime the Philippines will continue without a supreme tribunal.

Agitation for action by the Senate on the new Philippine Supreme Court appointees has grown since the resignation of Justice Romualdez on March 16, when it was foreseen that a quorum would be lacking for future sessions.

Delay in the Senate has been attributed in part to opposition to José Abad Santos, one of the appointees. Newspapers have opposed him because he defended a drastic libel law recently passed by the legislature. He was accused by a Manila lawyer of using his position as secretary to Justice Romualdez to influence the trial of an embezzlement case. He filed an action for libel against his accuser.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 99) to amend section 8 of the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1913, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 624) thereon.

Mr. NORBECK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 4291) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 625) thereon.

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3938) to provide for the transportation of certain juvenile offenders to States under the law of which they have committed offenses or are delinquent, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 626) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4020) to give the Supreme Court of the United States authority to prescribe rules of practice and procedure with respect to proceedings in criminal cases after verdict, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 627) thereon.

BANKING ACT OF 1932

Mr. NORBECK submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency to accompany the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, heretofore reported from that committee without amendment, which were ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 584, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 584, pt. 2, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

OPERATION OF THE NATIONAL AND FEDERAL RESERVE BANKING SYSTEM

Mr. NORBECK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following views of the minority (to accompany S. 4412):

The Senate Committee on Banking and Currency has had under consideration S. 4412, "To provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes," and reported favorably thereon on April 22, 1932 (Rept. No. 584).

On behalf of the minority of the members of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, I am making this report in protest against the proposed extension of branch banking, without taking issue with the distinguished author of the bill, Senator GLASS, on other matters in the bill, in most of which I heartily concur, and some of which I deem very important.

In speaking of our banking system, we must keep in mind that we have (1) a system of national banks chartered and supervised by the Federal Government; (2) we have a competitive system, that of State banks, chartered and supervised by the States.

There is difference of opinion among well-informed people as to their comparative merits, and certainly there is a great desire on the part of certain people to wipe out the State banking system. What can not be done directly by law may be done by giving the national system such an advantage that the competitive State system can not exist.

Aside from the two general classifications, we might make further classifications, as follows: Unit banks, chain banks, group banks, and branch banks.

A unit bank may have a National or State charter. It is generally defined as an institution which is owned, controlled, and operated by residents where the bank is located, and has no affiliated institutions. This is the typical American bank.

The term "chain bank" is generally applied where two or more banks are owned and controlled by one individual and partnership (without a holding company or more centralized control).

"Group bank" is the proper term for institutions that have been growing up in many sections of the country of late years. If not a violation of law, it is certainly an evasion of law. A holding company is generally organized for the purpose of owning and controlling these banks. As a rule, the holding company owns over 90 per cent of such bank stock, but there remains a local organization and a local board of directors, subject, however, to the control of the holding company, which is located in some central place.

It is a well-known fact that shares in a bank carry a double liability with them on the part of the stockholder. As a rule the shares in a holding company do not carry this extra liability, though there are a few notable exceptions to this practice. I have in mind especially the Detroit group, who appeared before this committee and explained their system.

Branch banking is where a parent bank has one financial structure from which it operates the several branches or offices under set rules and instructions issued by the head office. The officers of the several branches have very limited powers of discretion.

FALLING PRICES

Since the war there has been a continual shrinkage in values and this has put a great strain upon our banking structure. Numerous failures have been taking place, and those, who for different reasons prefer the chain bank with the central control, are continually pointing to the banking systems of other countries. But all things considered, the American system has held up wonderfully well. Our Government has not come to the direct aid of our banking structure, such as has been the case in many European countries, where the governmental form of banking exists, where the taxpayers took the losses.

We are often reminded of the losses suffered by depositors in this country. That is true, and it is deplorable; but it is not fair to point to other countries for comparison. The American dollar is still at par, while the bank deposits in foreign lands have dwindled in proportion to the shrinkage of their currency value; in Canada it is 20 per cent, and in France it is 80 per cent. We have much over which to be happy, and do not need to be hasty about importing a banking system from foreign lands.

The so-called safety of the French, Canadian, or English system is simply one of percentage, and we need not be ashamed of the comparison.

It is not believed that the remedy lies in more centralization. When we take the history of the chain bank, group bank, and branch bank, many States in the Union have had debacles which are appalling. The greatest bank failure in this whole depression was in the case of a branch-bank system—a central bank with some 50 or 60 branches. On the other hand, while the losses of unit banks in the United States, due to overbanking conditions and the present financial situation, have been devastating, we have no assurance that such a condition may not arise again under a different form of banking, as each generation must learn its own lesson, and human nature, as a rule, has never been able to capitalize 100 per cent from the mistakes of the past.

BRANCH BANKS

Advocates of the branch banking system ignore the fact that such a system has never been tried in a country of 120,000,000 population 3,000 miles across. They ignore the tendency in this country to centralize control of everything, and especially of credit. I believe the branch banking system would put us at the mercy of the financial centers.

THE CANADIAN SYSTEM

We hear much about the Canadian system, which is the outgrowth of the British system, but we hear only the good side of it. However, we occasionally run across something suspicious even in these presentations. We are told that Canada has only 11 banks, with an average of about 400 branches, and that there have been no failures. This statement is not in accordance with the record, for they have had numerous failures.

An advocate of the Canadian system in a recent magazine article said they had had only 16 failures in 62 years. The branches are not counted when the failures occur, but let us take them at their own statement. They have 11 banks and they have had 16 failures; that is more than a hundred per cent.

We are told that these 11 Canadian bankers have during the last few years had a smaller percentage of failures than the banks in this country, and I think that is true. But we have a large number of banks in this country that have had no failures, and certainly we have one banking system here, not above referred to, that has gone through entirely without losses, and it has done an enormous banking business. The worst thing that can be said about it is that it has not furnished accommodation to the communities where the deposits were received. They have taken no risk. They have not been interested in building up the communities. If we had only such a system, we would make no progress in our development; we would slow down—we would come to a standstill. The system is the nearest comparable to the Canadian system. I have reference, of course, to the postal savings bank that drains the community dry of its cash.

One of our distinguished Senators, who has spent a great deal of time in Canada, told me privately he believed the natural resources of Canada were equal to those of the United States. Their growth has only been one-tenth the growth of the United States. I believe we are much indebted to the unit banking system for this difference.

I feel that section 19 of the Glass bill should be eliminated in its entirety. There is a movement on foot to control the banking industry of the United States by centralization. This movement might be termed not only national but international. Of late years this movement has been becoming more evident. The only way it can be accomplished, apparently, is through nation-wide branch banking and the complete elimination of the unit bank.

The unit banker has had a most prominent place in the development of the United States. By reason of his individualistic characteristics he has been able to mold himself to meet any possible situation. It has been through his foresight, strength of character, and belief in these great United States of ours that our country has become the foremost in commerce and industry. His endeavors have been most outstanding. The history of our country might have been different if our banking system had been controlled from Washington or New York.

Our dual system of banking has been one of the great motivating factors in making the United States the outstanding country that it is to-day. Our country is too large, too widely diversified, to expect one banking system to be so versatile as to deal with so complex a situation efficiently. The American people are individualistic and so should be our banking structure. The unit bank has a most definite position in our national welfare.

Two reasons have been advanced why we should have one system of banking:

First. The commerce of the United States should be financed in an orderly manner; must have a uniform system of banking under Federal supervision. Our past history does not prove the necessity of the same.

Second. That the Federal Government can not rely upon the voluntary cooperation of State banks and trust companies for the execution of a national policy. The record is clear that there has never been a time when the unit bank or the State chartered institutions have not upheld the hands of our Government.

The placing of our banking structure with the now overburdened bureaucracy in Washington is in direct violation of the principle of State rights. So far no tangible evidence has been offered that the passage of this section would be of value to the rank and file of our citizenry or would meet and stabilize the present situation. We have always the matter of politics, change of administration, Government in business, which can not be overlooked. History repeats itself.

The past several years a large amount of propaganda has been fed to the people endeavoring to educate them to national branch banking, and while the resolutions of some of our financial organizations were rabid in their opposition to branch banking, owing to steady pressure from without and within, their position has been gradually changing.

This plan appears to be a part of the preconceived plan for the elimination of the unit State bank and placing the control of our banking structure in financial centers. Those interested in controlling the banking structure of our country will find it far more easy to handle Washington than some 19,000 different banking corporations scattered throughout the United States. When banking and credit are centralized in a few hands, it is easier for the powerful to get control of such corporations. In fact, Mr. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, testified before the Banking Committee that with good dollars he could "go out and buy every corporation in the world," and there seems to be no limit to the number of good dollars they control. This is most true.

DEMANDS FOR MORE POWER

Congress first allowed the national banks to have branches within the city in which they were located. The next step was to allow branches in metropolitan areas. Now the demand is made that we have what will mean nation-wide branch banking in its entirety, and plans have been offered which can be utilized in eliminating every unit bank by direct congressional action.

It is in the interest of the United States that a banking monopoly should not be created. The theory of siphoning credits through a branch-banking system has been exploded. Theoretically it functions perfectly until under pressure the pipe springs a leak. When the unit bank closes there is merely a "pop"; when a system of branch banks closes it is a detonation.

We only have to look back to the history of the endeavor to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, with its branches in the then leading cities, during the Presidency of Andrew Jackson, to prove now, as then, that a banking monopoly headed in at Washington is not for the best interests of the citizens of the United States.

The placing of more power in the national-banking system is dangerous. Additional powers given this system would not redound to its benefit unless it is coupled with legislation that will cripple or eradicate our present State-chartered institutions. This fear of centralization in the hands of a few is possibly one of the factors behind the popularity of State-chartered institutions and general satisfaction of our dual system of banking.

The following figures speak for themselves:

On December 31, 1931, there were in the United States 194 private banks, 587 mutual-savings banks, 546 stock-savings banks, 1,245 loan and trust companies, and 11,240 State banks—total, 13,812.

The national system had 6,368 banks, with capital from $10,000 up, of which less than 225 had a capital of $1,000,000 or over.

As of the same time, national banks had on deposit $19,210,000,000, which included $260,000,000 of funds of the United States; while deposits of State-chartered institutions were $30,486,000,000—a difference of $11,175,000,000 in favor of State-chartered institutions.

Now as to capital structure. State-chartered institutions had $175,000,000 more than national banks and a surplus of $1,700,000,000 in excess of those of national charter. In other words, State-chartered institutions had more millions of surplus above the amount of surplus of national banks than the total aggregate of capital and national banks.

Further, take the period from March 25, 1931, to December 30, 1931. We find that during the intervening period the deposits in national banks decreased $3,100,000,000, while deposits in State-chartered institutions decreased $3,700,000,000. The per cent of decrease in each instance is: National banks, 13 per cent; State banks, 8 per cent.

Now, further, a comparison of national bank suspensions and State bank suspensions:

In 1931, prior to the figures cited above, there were 409 bank suspensions, as against 161 for the year 1930, or an increase of 154 per cent. While the State-chartered institutions had 1,809 suspensions in 1931, as opposed to 1,128 in 1930, or an increase of 60 per cent, there were reopened in 1931, 25 national banks and 250 State-chartered institutions, or 10 to 1. In 1930 there were reopened 5 national banks and 140 State-chartered institutions.

Now as to deposits. Time deposits in national banks, including deposits of the Post Office Department in national banks, in December 30, 1931, were $7,594,000,000, as opposed to time deposits in State-chartered institutions of $18,430,000,000, or, roughly speaking, 2½ to 1 in State-chartered institutions. In the Postal Savings System, at the end of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1931, there was on deposit averaging $500 for each depositor, an aggregate of $347,000,000, an increase of $172,000,000 for the Government's fiscal year. Eight hundred and ten million dollars of the deposit shrinkage in State-chartered institutions were in savings accounts. The number of savings depositors decreased by one and a half million. Now, obviously, the million and one-half depositors who ceased having savings accounts in State-chartered institutions did not rush to the post office, for the increase in the number of postal savings depositors during the same period was 304,000, or less than one-fifth.

LIQUIDATING CORPORATION

It is hoped that a liquidating corporation will be the means of more prompt payment to depositors of some substantial part of their equity as soon as a bank is closed. It is not a guaranty of bank deposits, though it may point in that direction and, therefore, be subject to much criticism.

GUARANTEE OF DEPOSITS

The State banking system is threatened from another angle, and that is the great demand now on the part of the national banks to have guarantee of deposits. The request is based on the plea that it will restore confidence; but I do not hesitate to say there are national banks that would like to unload their losses on the Federal Treasury, and among them are some large ones; and where the bank is a large one, the taxpayer would be assuming a big burden. One of the purposes is to give the national bank a certain advantage over the State bank and destroy our dual system of banking. It is an indirect and an insidious way to do that which they dare not attempt to do directly.

The writer believes that guarantee of deposits may sometime become a reality, but it is quite convincing from the experience of many States that tried the bank guaranty law that a more careful approach to the subject must be made, and certainly it must be considered a form of insurance; therefore the two fundamental principles of insurance must be recognized: (1) No loss must be underwritten which can not be paid; (2) no risk should be assumed at 100 per cent value—75 per cent would be a safer figure. The depositor who could get 75 per cent cash would be fortunate indeed compared to some of those who wait many years on the slow liquidation of a receiver.

There are members of this committee who favor guaranty of bank deposits who would hesitate now to have the Government take over bank losses and also to destroy the State banking system, for State banks would not be included in the program for guaranty.

The depression started in agricultural sections brought down thousands of banks. These people have taken their losses. They protest against helping to pay the losses that are now threatening other sections.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 29th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 194) for the relief of Jeff Davis Caperton and Lucy Virginia Caperton.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4539) granting an increase of pension to Nathan J. Barwick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4540) granting an increase of pension to Kittie B. Campbell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas:

A bill (S. 4541) granting a pension to Lizzie Knight; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 151) relating to the manufacture of grasshopper poison; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RADIO ADDRESS OF EX-SENATOR JOSEPH I. FRANCE

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD a radio address delivered by ex-Senator Joseph I. France, of Maryland, April 22, 1932, on the Coercive Power of Federal Patronage and Legality and Moral Force of the Preferential Primaries for the Nomination of Candidates for the Presidency of the United States.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

THE COERCIVE POWER OF FEDERAL PATRONAGE AND LEGALITY AND MORAL FORCE OF THE PREFERENTIAL PRIMARIES FOR THE NOMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR THE PRESIDENCY OF THE UNITED STATES

It has been repeatedly stated that it would be impossible to prevent the renomination of Mr. Herbert Hoover for the Presidency at the next Republican National Convention. Why? Is it because he has made himself popular? No! Is it because his administration is a success? No! Is it because his renomination is desired or thought advisable by the outstanding party leaders? No! It is boldly stated that he will be able to force his renomination through the use and abuse of Federal patronage. How is the power of this Federal patronage exercised? Mr. Hoover implicitly demands that those who have been appointed by him to lucrative Federal positions lay aside the high and important duties, as servants of the Republic, and devote themselves to pernicious, vicious, and possibly illegal activities to promote his renomination. Thus we find the Postmaster General enjoying a high and responsible position and a large salary laying aside his duties and devoting himself to the fine art of political manipulation to secure the renomination of his Chief, by whose grace he holds office. Thus we see, in the State of Maryland, the collecter of internal revenue, Mr. Galen L. Tait, devoting his time, which belongs to the people of the United States, to the perfecting of an organization in the State of Maryland to secure the renomination of Mr. Hoover. By his very official position the collector of internal revenue, by implication, may exercise a certain coercive power over the electorate. He receives the income-tax blanks, collects the revenue, and has general supervisory powers and some discretion as to whether he should receive those returns as regular and just. As collector of taxes he is in a position of power.

Under all the ancient oppressive governments of earth the tax-gatherers have been the oppressors of the people. Under this new scheme of things the collector of internal revenue is not merely the head of a large organization of subordinates who aid him in the collection of taxes, but through his coersive power over them he makes himself the head of a powerful political organization. Such action can not be defended as moral. It is a question whether it could be defended in a court of law. If, however, the collector of internal revenue, at the time when he appoints a subordinate, demands a resignation in blank in order that he may be able to control the subordinate's political activities, he is then committing a criminal act. I asked a prominent politician this afternoon if the Hoover people had opened any headquarters here. He said, "No; they have no headquarters except the custom-house. Mr. Tait's offices are headquarters."

Moreover, it is believed that in certain instances the promise of office is being used contrary to law to control the political activities of certain citizens. It is reported that the postmastership at Baltimore is being kept vacant and that it has been hinted to a number of aspirants that each may have a chance of appointment. The same condition has been reported concerning other promises of reward. Thus they hope to assist the candidacy of Mr. Hoover by dangling lucrative offices and juicy political plums before the noses of those to whom office means more than an efficient and uncorrupted Republic. By such methods Mr. Taft was renominated in 1912 over that valient champion of good government—Theodore Roosevelt. In the subsequent election Mr. Taft carried but two States. A prominent nominal supporter of Hoover, in answer to a question as to whether Mr. Hoover could be re-elected is quoted as saying, "Mr. Taft carried Vermont and Utah, but Mr. Hoover will not do as well. He will lose Utah."

Such political methods as this resulted in the enactment, by several of the States, of presidential preference primary laws.

There has been a studied and continuous propaganda for weeks, emanating from apparently some one source, to the effect that the preferential primaries in the States for candidates for the Presidency of the United States are not binding. This statement has been so persistently presented to the American public in all of the press articles concerning the popular vote in the States that it becomes glaringly apparent that there are selfish and sinister motives involved, if not the malicious intent to becloud the issue and minimize the sacredness of the ballot in giving expressions to the will of the masses of our people.

In many of the States laws were enacted; the processes of election set up with all the formality of filing candidacies under strict stipulations as to the required number of voters in each State to sponsor each candidate. The elections have been held and are to be held under the strictest legal procedure as provided in the statutes of the States, but it becomes the duty of certain political headquarters to announce that the results of such elections are not binding upon the delegates elected to the national conventions.

Such interpretation of the laws of the States makes them not only a work of deception, if the interpretations are held to be true; not only a camouflage that would direct the public mind from the successful candidate under the preferential primaries; but, more than that, they make the procedure a violation of every moral and ethical principle and a mockery of justice.

In announcing my campaign for the Republican presidential nomination I did not leave the American people uncertain as to my principles, my ideals, and my practical platform of action. There is no public question confronting the masses to-day on which there may be doubt as to my position.

Under the orderly processes of law, those who have sponsored my candidacy have carried out the requirements of the law and my name has been filed in most of the States where preferential primaries are held.

In North Dakota, with 11 votes; in Illinois, with 61 votes; in Nebraska, with 19 votes, three States where the primary elections have been held, my name was filed by my adherents, and the proper official of each of these States must certify my name to the national convention as the popular will of the people in the preferential election for the Republican presidential nomination. In like manner in the other States where the preferential primaries are to be held, the will of the people must be certified by the States to the national convention. In an opinion rendered by the attorney general of the State of Nebraska, he states "There is a moral obligation on the part of the delegates to vote for a person indorsed for President in the primaries."

In an opinion rendered by the attorney general of the State of Illinois, under date of April 14, he quotes paragraph 393 of chapter 46, Smith-Hurd's Revised Statutes, 1931, which is section 29 of the primary law, and reads in part as follows:

"Provided, That the vote for President of the United States, as herein provided for, shall be for the sole purpose of securing an expression of the sentiment and will of the party voters with respect to candidates for nomination for said office, and the vote of the State at large shall be taken and considered as advisory to the delegates and alternates at large to the national conventions of respective political parties; and the vote of the respective congressional districts shall be taken and considered as advisory to the delegates and alternates of said congressional districts to the national conventions of the respective political parties."

The deputy attorney general of the State of Maryland in an opinion rendered April 14 said:

"The results of a presidential primary election in this State are binding upon the delegates elected to the State convention, and also the delegates selected by the State convention to the National convention." And further, "the delegates of such party selected by such State convention to the national convention of such party from the State of Maryland shall be instructed and bound to vote as a unit in the national convention for such candidate for President so selected as the choice of the State of Maryland as aforesaid, and such delegates shall continue to vote in such national convention for the choice of the State of Maryland as aforesaid for President as long as in their conscientious judgment there is any possibility of his being nominated."

In the State of Ohio each candidate for election as a delegate or alternate files, along with the declaration of candidacy and certificate, a statement in writing in the following form:

"I hereby declare to the voters of my political party in the State of Ohio that, if elected as delegate to their national party convention, I shall, to the best of my judgment and ability, support that candidate for President of the United States who shall have been selected at this primary by the voters of my party in the manner provided in this chapter as their candidate for such office."

And the attorney general of the State of Ohio in an opinion has said:

"The Secretary of State shall canvass the returns in the manner provided by law for canvassing the returns in the case of candidates for nomination to State offices, and shall forthwith certify the results of such canvass as regards the candidates for nomination in such political party to the persons chosen as delegates or alternates to the national convention of such party."

Invariably the opinion is expressed on the highest authority of the officials of the States that there is the moral obligation for the delegates elected in the preferential primaries to vote for the candidates for President, under the instructions of the people, as expressed through the ballot, a procedure which is the very bulwark of the fundamental principles of the Republic as enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, in the Constitution of the United States, and in the State papers of the Chief Executives of the Nation who have upheld the principles and doctrines of government formulated by the fathers of the Republic.

Notwithstanding the studied propaganda to which I have referred, in the eleventh hour, so to speak, prior to the primary in my own State—the State of Maryland—Mr. Hoover, the present incumbent of the high office of President, has filed; and notwithstanding further that in all the other States he has not had the courage to submit his cause to the popular vote of the people. He did not file in North Dakota. He did not file in Illinois nor in Nebraska. My name was filed and the votes of these three States in which the primary elections have already been held belong to me by every legal process of the State and by every moral obligation. Mr. Hoover would not file in Pennsylvania. He did not file in Ohio. He did not file in New Jersey. He did not file in West Virginia. He did not file in Oregon. In those States my name was filed by my adherents, under due processes of law. The time limitation for filing having expired, the votes of those States will be certified to the national convention and under legal processes and by moral right the votes of the delegates of those States must be cast in favor of my nomination.

If the preferential primary votes in all of the other States are not binding, then why should Mr. Hoover file in Maryland? Is Maryland the only State where the primary is binding? Is it on the theory that the preferential primary in Maryland will be binding but in all the other States not binding?

It has been asserted by certain party leaders supposedly representing Mr. Hoover that the votes in the other States where the preferential primaries have been held and are to be held, notwithstanding the will of the people, will be whipped into line and cast in favor of Mr. Hoover. Have we reached the time in the United States when our moral fiber is so weakened that the President of the United States would commit the immoral act of demanding or even accepting the votes of the delegates that are legally and morally bound to another? It is being openly stated that the delegates to the Maryland State convention have been pledged, before their nomination, to support Mr. Hoover, regardless of the popular vote. In other words, when I win the votes of the people of Maryland indorsing my candidacy, is it the purpose of those delegates to vote for Hoover, contrary to the law and morals?

Are we ready as a nation to admit that the Republic is dead and that our democracy has yielded to dictatorship and autocracy? God forbid! I submit this question fairly and courageously to the people of my State, and I call upon them to so rededicate themselves to the principles of our Republic that they will repudiate the men, regardless of their high places, as committeemen, national legislators, or Chief Executive, who would violate the simple code of morals and thus undermine our scheme of government and ultimately destroy our institutions and civilization.

ADDRESS BY GOV. GEORGE H. DERN, OF UTAH

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have here an address by Gov. George H. Dern, of Utah, delivered at the conference of governors in Richmond, Va., on April 26. It is a very able address of a nonpartisan character, and, I think, will be of interest to the Senate and the country. I ask leave to have it published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA MARCHING ON

When the governors' conference met last year Pollyanna speeches seemed singularly puerile. By this time, however, we have become so badly bogged in the slough of despond that many of us have forgotten that there is a celestial city toward which we are struggling. I have a feeling that the time has arrived when we ought to brace up and make up our minds that America is marching on.

I suppose a nation's onward march is always intermittent and that when obstacles are encountered there must be pauses and readjustments before the march can be resumed.

I confess that I have lost some of my youthful trust in the old copy-book motto, "Truth is mighty and will prevail," and also in the theory that the world is constantly getting better. I am afraid it is not so automatic as that. If it were, "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome" would not have been submerged in the cruel ignorance and superstition of the Dark Ages. The world keeps getting better only so long as there are enough men and women actively working to make it better. An old prophet said, "Where there is no vision the people perish." He, too, saw that progress is not automatic but depends upon leadership.

The United States is still a young nation, full of vitality, with a great destiny yet to fulfill. We have prided ourselves upon the energy, the resourcefulness, the self-reliance, and the hopefulness of the American people. This is no time to lose that energy, that resourcefulness, that confidence, and that optimism. Let our young Nation keep them, and "youth will be served."

How better can we observe the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington than by emulating his lofty determination to overcome all obstacles? Are our times any more discouraging than were the dark days at Valley Forge? Have we become a nation of cowards and weaklings, who can find no better occupation than to sit and repine? That was not the spirit which won the American Revolution, and that is not the spirit which will carry America forward in 1932.

America must march on. The depression has shown us that there are maladjustments, very serious maladjustments, in our so-called democracy. Perhaps it is well that these parlous times have thrown them out into bold relief so that we can all see them. Perhaps it is well that we have been forced to realize that if America is to march on, these maladjustments must be corrected.

We have two schools of thought in this country. The one merely wants to tinker up the old machine so it will run a little while until it breaks down again. The other wants to let its feet be guided by the lamp of experience and make such changes as to assure us that the machine shall not break down again—at least not in the same weak spot. The one would disregard all the shameful injustice of the past and present, and stand pat. The other would strive for progress and a square deal for all.

I heard an English lecturer recently define a pessimist as one who sees a calamity in every opportunity and an optimist as one who sees an opportunity in every calamity.

Let us not become a nation of calamity howlers. Let us not permit ourselves to become steeped in an atmosphere of defeatism. Sound optimism and healthy common sense are an absolute necessity to-day. Without them we can not cure the ills of our society, and it is certain that democracy can not flourish in a sick society. We have all the symptoms of a sick society.

A friend of mine said the other day that society is like the old woman who dotes on her symptoms: The more she reads the more symptoms she discovers, and the more patent medicines she tries. If we can only exorcise the devils of gloom, fear, and despair, and treat our ills in a rational way, we shall hasten our restoration to economic health.

If, instead of looking for more fancied ailments, or sitting idly by waiting for God, or the weather, or a change of heart in the bankers to bring us relief, we adopt the psychology of health, with a will to do the things that are necessary to bring us back to health, we shall the sooner have America marching on again. The strong, hopeful, courageous, constructive, resourceful individuals who have led America forward to colossal achievement in the past must again exhibit those virtues and lead us out of this morass. The time calls for something more than petty, piddling palliatives.

Is it not a travesty to say that millions of good, stanch Americans must go hungry because there is too much food; that millions must be ragged and scantily clad because there is too much wool and cotton; that millions must be cold because there is too much fuel? And yet that is the kind of foolishness that we have been enduring for the past two years. We can not afford to be smugly content with our present system.

I do not look forward with equanimity to a future when there shall again be seven to ten million men out of work in the United States, with only this difference, that they shall be better supported in their idleness. That might be brought about by unemployment insurance, and would be a great improvement over what we have this year, but it would hardly be a cure at all.

Surely humanity will never be satisfied until business and industry are so stabilized and controlled that this wicked thing called unemployment shall be relegated to the limbo for discarded evils.

That is an easy thing to say but a tremendously difficult thing to accomplish. At any rate, it is a social ideal toward which we should be striving if we want America to become the land of social justice. Perhaps some far-reaching readjustments will have to be made in our business practices. The important thing is to keep thinking about it and working at it. The greatest impediments to progress are apathy and indifference. These resist improvement and reform more effectually than do the interests which think they are going to be hurt by a change.

We must prevent panics. Alternate periods of prosperity and depression, which economists call the business cycle, may be inescapable; but surely man is not so helpless that he can not keep them within some sort of reasonable limits.

One way to prevent panics is to prevent booms, for a panic is merely the reaction from a boom. "What!" cries the individualist, "interfere with a citizen running his own business in his own way? Horrible!" Well, I am an individualist, too, and yet I reply, "What! Let a citizen run his own business in such a way as to drag his fellow citizens down to ruin and misery? More horrible!"

Unless we are willing to put a watchman on the wall to warn us of approaching danger, greed and avarice will again and again cook up their poisonous speculative broth to lay us low.

Unless we are willing to do something toward stabilizing business we shall keep right on letting our people make money and then taking it away from them and reducing them to poverty.

Unless we are willing to take some constructive step toward permitting or enforcing control of production we shall continue to have overproduction, with its aftermath of depression and the cruel suffering of unemployment.

Unless we devise some feasible method of controlling credit, speculative orgies will again bring on panics, with all their human wreckage.

Unless we improve our banking system we shall again, in some future panic, have 8,000 bank failures, with all their tragedies.

Unless we stabilize our monetary system we shall time after time wipe out the debtor class and paralyze the producer class.

We are in the habit of saying that commodity prices are down. It would be more accurate to say that money is up. It is up because it is scarce. We have as much gold and currency as we had three years ago, but gold and currency are only a very small part of our money. Most of our money consists of bank credits. If a bank makes a loan and places the amount to the credit of the borrower so that he may check against it, the result is just the same as if he had so much gold in his pocket. In 1929 we had $40,000,000,000 of bank credits in the United States, and $5,000,000,000 of specie and currency. To-day the bank credits are $13,000,000,000 less than they were two and one-half years ago, which means that we have $13,000,000,000 less money now than we had then. The result is that the dollar has become scarce, and hence dear, and when the dollar goes up in value, God help the poor fellow who owes debts and taxes, for those debts and taxes are still payable in the same old dollar, and he must get that dollar, no matter what he has to pay for it. He must sacrifice his crops, or his manufactured products, or his stocks and bonds, or his real estate, or his labor for whatever they will bring in order to get the dollars with which to pay his obligations.

We scoff at Germany for inflating her currency after the war by means of the printing press, which enabled her debtor class to pay up easily in depreciated money but ruined the creditors and investors. That sounds very unjust, but are we doing any better? We are doing the same sort of thing, only on the other side. We are contracting our currency and ruining the debtor class by forcing payments in appreciated money. Which is worse, to ruin the creditors or to ruin the debtors? Of course, it is a conscienceless proceeding to ruin either one. We shall never make even a pretense of dealing justly by our people until we prevent situations like the present one when, as Prof. Irving Fisher said the other day, each dollar of debt has grown to be a dollar and a half. In other words, we need a stable or fixed dollar, so that when a man pays his debts he shall pay what he promised to pay—no more and no less.

The present depression is not due to any one cause. Indeed, many diagnosticians have a tendency to confuse cause and effect. In other words, they cite certain things as causes of the depression which are actually results of the depression. Nevertheless, some of the effects of the depression have become causes of our failure to recover from it.

I sometimes think every Senator and Congressman ought to have a trained economist on his secretarial staff and ought to listen to his advice rather than to the special pleas of privilege hunters who are looking out only for No. 1. Of course, there are economists and economists, and I do not mean that they should all belong to the same school, but they should all understand economic principles.

Business executives do not pretend to all-wisdom on every subject under the sun—they hire and rely upon experts, engineers, chemists, accountants, appraisers, economists. All our problems are economic problems. Why should they not be solved by experts instead of being messed up by amateurs? Winston Churchill says the task of the statesmen is to decide where to go and then to leave it to experts to figure out how to get there.

Some Members of our National Legislature, after years of service, become specialists on one or two subjects, but they must vote on all subjects. Too often they vote on "hunches" rather than on exact knowledge.

I started out to make an optimistic speech, but not a Pollyanna speech. Perhaps I have put more challenge than optimism into it, but I have not meant to do so. Worn-out and discredited economic and political maxims and fetishes we must cast aside. Constructive measures to overcome existing evils we must not be afraid to try. Social justice must be our goal.

I repeat that I think we have the strong, hopeful, courageous, constructive, resourceful individuals in the United States who will lead out so that before long we shall again see America marching on.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1932

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou art infinitely worthy, Lord God Almighty, because all Thy judgments are just and true. Vouchsafe unto us this day the presence of Thy Holy Spirit. Let us not be diverted by the immediate aspects and circumstances of life. Take away any distemperature of controversy, of conflicts, of passions, and help us to consecrate to our Republic the whole strength of our honor and wisdom. May we always adorn our estate with manliness and unselfish devotion. O God, lead us to be single-hearted, clear-eyed, without confusion, without haste; thus may we pursue the path of our duty. May we arise as messengers of a better day, of an unconquerable people whose hearts beat in the deepest sympathy with world redemption. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNVEILING OF MONUMENT TO JOSEPH HEWES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a speech made by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] at Edenton, N. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, by permission of the House, I take pleasure in inserting in the RECORD a very able and delightful speech made by the Hon. SOL BLOOM, of New York, at Edenton, N. C., on April 28, at the unveiling of the statue erected by Congress to Joseph Hewes, a signer of the Declaration of Independence. In a large measure the success of the occasion was due to the interest and untiring efforts of Mr. BLOOM as associate director of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. SOL BLOOM, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

I see all about me the pride and pleasure which the good people of this historic city have every right to take on this occasion. But it is my rare privilege to draw from it a pleasure that is probably greater than that felt by anyone else who is present.

On the program of the day I am put down as responding to an address of welcome. I have certainly had a welcome here that stirs every fiber of my being.

But in turn I bring a welcome and a blessing to you—a welcome that comes to you from the entire United States.

The welcome I bring you is for the important addition you are making here to this tribute our people are pouring forth this year. That is why I may claim to enjoy a pleasure even greater than your own.

I feel all the pride that you feel. And to that is added the pride of all the millions of good Americans in our country. For the unveiling and dedication of this monument to Joseph Hewes takes appropriate place among the most important of all the celebrations of the year.

Joseph Hewes played a pivotal part in the life and labors of George Washington, whose friend he was. The shining patriot who lived here, and forever adorns the history of your city, was far more than a mere passive signer of the Declaration of Independence.

We have it on the authority of John Adams that Joseph Hewes cast the deciding vote that led to the adoption of that immortal charter of our liberties.

The Continental Congress had already sent George Washington to chief command on the fields of battle where our national destiny was to be decided. In the Declaration of Independence it placed in Washington's hands full warrant for all he might be called upon to do in the winning of our liberties.

Without the vote of Joseph Hewes that warrant would have been withheld. But with the deciding voice of Hewes history perfected itself, and George Washington was armed with the last great power he needed—the power of an aroused, united, and flaming public opinion.

And the adoption of the Declaration of Independence was no easy matter. We are told by recorders of that great crisis that for months the question of independence had been discussed, and always the majority had been against it.

Clouds and uncertainties surrounded that deliberative body. Dangers hovered over it. What happened we have in the words of John Adams himself.

"For many days," says Adams, "the majority (against the declaration) depended on Mr. Hewes, of North Carolina. While a member one day was speaking and reading documents from all the Colonies to prove that public opinion, the sense of all, was in favor of the measure, when he came to North Carolina and produced letters and public proceedings which demonstrated that the majority in that Colony were in favor of it, Mr. Hewes, who had hitherto constantly voted against it, started suddenly upright, and lifting both hands to heaven as if he had been in a trance, cried, 'It is done, and I will abide by it.'"

And then exulting John Adams says, "I would give more for a perfect painting of the terror and horror upon the face of the old majority [against the declaration] at that critical moment than for the best piece by Raphael."

It is little wonder that George Washington made friends with a man of such courage.

There is, perhaps, little that is new that I could impart to you concerning the great patriot who lived here. The people of Edenton are in a position to give rather than receive information concerning him.

My errand here is rather to give you a sense of how this occasion fits like a jewel into the picture of an entire people. The Nation is rendering this year a great tribute to its greatest man, and to all the lofty-minded men and women who either aided him personally, or backed his efforts with that loyal public opinion which John Adams refers to with such exultation.

This year an entire Nation takes delight in going over its long and honorable history and feeling at one with its past. It gives us all a new dignity, a new feeling of stability, to turn and take note of our increasing age as a people, and watch the lengthening years stretch out behind us.

It enables us to feel that we are no longer a "young" or "new" nation, but now stand as a fixture among the firmest and strongest nations of human history.

And under all this new pleasure that has come to us, I see a deep and wholesome national instinct. It is more than a mere curiosity as to our history that is turning us back to the past, so that we may say to ourselves again: "Yes; these great men, these shining adornments to history, belong to us. They are Americans. We produced them."

We are turning back to them because we know they were leaders who triumphed in a difficult and dangerous time. Now our country, together with the entire world, is in another difficult and puzzling period. We stand confused and anxious. The cry for leadership arises on every hand. We are troubled for our personal fortunes, and some of us even for our national safety.

So, in the midst of our fears, we have an instinct to turn back and see how Washington and his fellow patriots mastered their trials and discouragements. We feel a need to profit by their example, to study their methods, and refresh ourselves from the spirit of self-giving that made them patriots and made them great.

For many years we have felt that we lived in a wholly new and improved time. We looked upon the America of to-day, with its marvelous inventions and advancements, as something new in the world. By comparison the America of Washington's time looked primitive and old-fashioned. tI seemed to belong to a day that was past.

I believe that if we were honest enough to confess it, we felt toward Washington himself that while he was undeniably a great man in his time, he, too, belonged in the past.

But now we have found that even this most advanced world of to-day is subject to the same shocks and stresses that have afflicted nations since the world began. We have found that not all our wealth could save us from uncertainty and fear and distress. We have found that even this scientific time is in danger without the old human virtues of unselfishness, patriotism, thought of country before thought of self.

And so we are moved by a deep and saving instinct to turn back to the great men who practiced these virtues and built so great a nation. We feel a need to purge ourselves of the vices of greed and selfishness and forgetfulness of country, that have brought us into loss and confusion, and be filled again with the sublime incentives of the fathers.

In my opinion, nothing else than this profound popular instinct can account for the quiet but great and strong enthusiasm which our people are throwing into this remarkable year-long tribute of respect and reverence to George Washington and his great associates. It is more than a passing jubilee; it is the solemn rededication of a people to their ancient standards, and to the mighty souls of old who set us the immortal example of how those standards should be held aloft.

To many of us, no doubt, this return to our ancient history can be hardly more than a refreshing study, an effort to grasp from books and pictures a sense of the reality of our past.

But there are in the country certain privileged localities that are the very birthplaces of that history. There we get a real feeling of the actuality of those days and their great men. For there about us are the very houses where they lived and planned, the very churches where they worshiped, the very streets they passed along on their way to business.

This city of Edenton is such a place. It seems to me that here we see America at its very best.

You have here superbly beautiful natural settings and surroundings. You have here traditions of the finest culture, running back to America's very beginnings. You have a record of patriotism that takes its place beside that of any other community in the original Colonies.

An honored dweller in this colonial town played a decisive rôle in upholding George Washington's arm and in establishing the freedom of all the Colonies. And into this community President George Washington reached for a member of the Supreme Court, so that the work of Joseph Hewes in molding our national structure was continued by James Iredell, his intimate friend and lifelong admirer.

By contributing all this Edenton fixes itself forever in American history, and by celebrating to-day the memory of one of her great patriots your city adds, as I say, a touching and important feature to the Nation's great program of tribute this year.

And in marking the everlasting memory of one of these men you are animated, I know, by something of that same wave of national feeling which I have witnessed everywhere else in the country—this turning back to the ancient spirit for that renewal of purpose which we crave and need so much to-day.

So here, too, the underlying instinct and plan of this memorable bicentennial year is being fulfilled.

And so I, who have come here to receive one welcome, bring you another welcome from an America united this year as never before; rallied as one behind the memory of Washington and of those upon whom he relied for help and support.

Let us remember that while these deeply moving occasions remind us of the dignity of our increasing age, nevertheless, America is always new. It is as new to-day as it was in the days when Washington ordered read to his troops the Declaration of Independence, made possible by the brave and self-sacrificing vote of your famous townsman, Joseph Hewes.

Our Nation is ever new because it has new problems to face and to master every day. For that is the law of progress. If we are to march on, we must be prepared to meet new obstacles at every stage.

The truth of the matter is that every day every one of us has his own declaration of independence to sign. Every day the Nation itself must start a new independence.

In the day of Washington and Joseph Hewes, the independence so passionately desired, so defiantly declared, and so heroically fought for, was independence from a foreign political tyranny.

Washington, with men like Joseph Hewes to support him, forever settled that great question.

But to-day we need independence from the tyranny of distress, from selfishness, and a hundred enemies within our own borders, that have reduced us to fear and uncertainty.

It is high time that we turned back and learned how the fathers won their independence that we may learn how to win ours.

The man to whose everlasting honor and memory this shaft is unveiled to-day was the type of man who could vote a saving measure for this country, though he knew that measure might ruin his business. Long before the Declaration of Independence was discussed, Joseph Hewes voted for nonimportation of English goods, though his whole fortune depended on his ships and his trade.

Joseph Hewes died at the post of duty. He gave his life to his country as truly as if he had lost it on the field of battle. Frail of body, he devoted himself to brave stands in the council chamber and there labored with a fierceness of energy that finally killed him. He thus ends a perfect record of service to his country and his fellow countrymen with the crowning touch of being the first Member of the Continental Congress to die almost at his desk.

In a letter written while the clouds of the Revolutionary War were gathering, Joseph Hewes tells that he has bought a good musket and a bayonet, and that he would rather fall in action than fade away from his lingering malady.

His wish was fulfilled though in a different way. He died for country after labors and achievements that accomplished far more for his people than he could with a musket in the ranks.

Upbuilder of his young country's commerce, faithful representative of his countrymen in their provincial assemblies, fearless upholder of their rights in the Continental Congress, signer of the Declaration of their Independence, first executive head of their Navy, wise and experienced legislator—Joseph Hewes was the perfect example of those self-giving men who made possible George Washington's work for America and for humanity.

It is to the type of patriot represented by your eminent townsman that we are turning back this year, in this national impulse I speak of—this instinct to recapture some of the iron will, the fearless determination, and all the other sturdy virtues that enabled those men to triumph over their dangers and difficulties—so that we may become the masters of ours.

If we would honor Joseph Hewes here and George Washington everywhere this year, this is the one best way we can do so—by bringing the spirit of 1776 into the problems of 1932.

Your welcome here reflects truly the finest traditions of this beautiful Southland. It is the perpetual tie of that fine hospitality that reaches us and binds us with the past. In this glorious season of vernal beauty when all nature joins in a grand chorus of praise to our All Merciful Creator, your welcome blends with that spirit of friendliness that makes us one with Him.

Those who come here, as I do, for the first time, feel that we have gained a certain enrichment in our lives. There is an impression that will last always, not alone of what you do and say to-day, but of the atmosphere which shines like a radiance all about us.

I have a new understanding of your love for this place; your yielding to its charms; your local patriotism. And your welcome seems to breathe a sentiment of all those who have gone before you—a welcome to your lives and to your hearts.

So long as that sentiment prevails, so long as we preserve that strong feeling of attachment to our native land, so long will our Nation last. In honoring an American patriot we honor our land. This reverent act performed here to-day seems to me proof that it is our national impulse this year. It speaks out in this noble tribute of respect. It is speaking wherever the memory of George Washington, or any of his coworkers, is likewise honored during this two hundredth year since Washington's birth.

I therefore stand here moved as never before, because I believe the feeling here and everywhere else exhibited in America this year is a proof that our country is safe, because by such very acts as this, it is refreshing itself from the men and the principles that brought it into being and gave it life.

I believe in the principles laid down by George Washington.
I believe in the wisdom of his compatriots.
I believe in the Americans of to-day.
I believe in—America.

ECONOMY

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject of vocational agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, we hear the cry on every hand that the Government must economize, yet at the administration's instance a moratorium was granted to Europe whereby we lost $252,000,000, temporarily at least, and I think permanently. Then the administration brought up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, called by its enemies "the millionaire's dole for big business," which carries an appropriation of $500,000,000, with a possible expenditure of $2,000,000,000.

After having recommended that these amounts be expended, the administration is now looking for places to economize, and retrenchment against vocational agriculture is suggested by the President in the sum of $8,500,000, which is insignificant compared with the enormous sums I have just mentioned.

There is not a Member of this House who is more deeply sensible of the fact that our Government must economize, or whose every act has been more in that direction, than myself, but I certainly am unalterably opposed to any such means of economizing as that suggested by the President in this instance. Appropriations made for purposes such as the education of our youth in agriculture should not be decreased, as that would be false economy in the long run. There are other means of economizing without taking from the youth of our country the advantages which they have enjoyed and which are of such material benefit to them in future life.

For the past 15 years the State of Oklahoma has made appropriations in good faith, expecting a permanent allotment annually from the funds created by the tax. These State appropriations are made on a cooperative basis; therefore the withdrawal of Federal funds for one year would destroy the program in my State. The withdrawal of the Federal allotment in my State would mean depriving 5,000 adult farmers from receiving organized instruction in problems which confront them locally, including living-at-home readjustment; (2) depriving 4,000 farm boys from continuing their training in vocational agriculture, through whose efforts 68,000 acres of home farms were terraced; (3) 130 specially trained teachers of agriculture would be thrown into unemployment in the State of Oklahoma; (4) would destroy 15 years of effort in developing an efficient training program for future farmers; (5) would deprive 130 local communities in my State of funds necessary to provide a systematic and efficient training program.

The remarks I have just made apply particularly to vocational agriculture, but I desire to extend them to take in vocational education in general and to state that vocational education is justifying the hope of those who sponsored the legislature creating Federal support for this work, and that it would be a serious mistake to permit legislation at this time which would practically destroy the efforts of both the Federal Department of Vocational Education and the State department of vocational education which have been exerted over the past 15 years.

OUR TRANSPORT SERVICE

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend some remarks of mine on our transport service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, we are proud of our Army and Navy Transport Services. They are well organized, fully equipped for specialized work, and are efficiently operated. The officers and the enlisted personnel are of the highest types. The ships are rendering a peace-time service that is absolutely essential to our far-flung activities. They are operated at a cost considerably less than the amount the Government would be obliged to pay to regular commercial lines for the same work. The proposition of discontinuance of operation would not result in economy. Since 1927 the Navy transports have been operated as a unit at a profit.

The cost of operation of the Army transports from 1908 to and including 1931 has been $70,933,786.40. The lowest commercial rates for the same service would have cost the Government $119,455,859.34. For the year 1931 the cost of the Army Transport Service, including depreciation and interest, was $4,666,576.98. The cost for the same service commercially would have been $6,238,310.74. This represents a saving for the year of $1,571,733.76.

Discontinuance of the Transport Services would be at the expense of reducing the efficiency of national defense by taking away an integral part of the Military and Naval Establishments. Commercial lines are not equipped for the specialized service that is required.

We also take pride in the building of the Panama Canal, through which flows a considerable portion of the commerce of the world. Its construction was one of the great engineering feats of the age and stands as a monument to the genius of American engineers. The Panama Railroad, running from Colon to Panama, connects the east with the west coast and follows, generally, the course of the canal. Practically all of the stock of this railroad company is owned by the United States Government, but it is operated as a separate corporation.

The railroad company operates a steamship line to New York for the transportation of freight and passengers. It is a necessary adjunct to the canal. Passenger business is made up largely of Government employees in the Canal Zone. Life in the tropics is wearing and it is necessary for Americans who live there to come periodically to the Temperate Zone for recuperation. The Government has, in effect, promised transportation to its employees and members of their families at the rate of $30 each way, or $60 for the round trip. Government freight is carried at 75 per cent of the regular tariff fixed by commercial lines, so the Government is a beneficiary of all its freight carried and Government employees have the benefit of a considerable reduction for their transportation. This reduction approximates $500,000 per annum.

The steamship line operated with reduced rates has had an average annual loss of $60,000 during the past five years, but, if the same rates charged by commercial lines had been collected, it would have shown a profit of $440,781.43. It is perfectly clear that the operation is not carried on at a loss to the Federal Government. The railroad company has shown an average annual profit for these five years of $1,769,979.58, after absorbing all of the losses of the steamship lines, so there has been no loss, in fact. The steamship line is not financed by the Treasury, pays no dividends into it, and receives no funds from it.

It was proposed in the economy bill to discontinue the operation of the steamship line, to dispose of the vessels, wind up its affairs, and make contracts with commercial lines for the service. While it is true that as a condition precedent to carrying out this scheme contracts must be entered into with these commercial lines at substantially the same rates as now prevail, there is no question but that the Government, under such a plan, would soon find itself at the mercy of the shipping interests.

The whole move seems to be an attempt, under the smoke screen of economy, to gain control of Government shipping in the Canal Zone by big outside shipping concerns. This plan has been whispered about the tropics for years, and it has been generally understood that the attempt would be made just as soon as a favorable opportunity presented itself. The House did a good thing in the interests of economy to defeat the move. Similar proposals have been rejected within the last 10 years by three Secretaries of War, three committees of Congress, by the Chief Coordinator, and by former President Coolidge.

The Hon. Dwight F. Davis, then Secretary of War, well set forth the situation in a letter to the President, dated April 27, 1928, when he said:

> The line is an integral part of the Panama Canal and indispensable in its discharge of its normal responsibilities. The successful operation of this great enterprise, which is of vital importance to the United States, demands absolute security as to its line of supply to this country.

We must guarantee absolute security in the operation and control of the Panama Canal.

Let us hope that the defeat of the proposal ends for all time any attempt on the part of all greedy interests to gain control of our Army and Navy Transport Services and the Panama Canal service.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11267, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KETCHAM: Page 35, line 20, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct attention to this amendment, which is not of very great consequence but which I think has a sufficient degree of importance to merit a moment's consideration.

I am asking that the word "shall," in line 20, which gives a positive direction to the Administrator of Public Works to utilize the services of the Corps of Engineers or the officers of that corps, when it shall prove practicable, shall be changed from that positive direction to a permissive direction; that is, that he may do it instead of being directed to do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman and I have the same thing in mind; but how would the amendment correct the defect and the situation that we are both trying to avoid?

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, when that line is read using the word "shall" followed with the language "whenever and wherever practicable" it will be found that the discretionary power of the administrator of public works is not made very broad. In other words, when he finds it practicable to use these men a positive direction is given him that he shall utilize the services of the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. I had in mind the offering of a similar amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Michigan. For instance, in the Bureau of Public Roads this amendment would in effect direct that the approving of road projects should be done by the Army engineers. That is not practicable nor for the best interest of the road-building service.

Mr. KETCHAM. The reason I am proposing this amendment is that a reading of this whole section discloses that the Corps of Engineers has not had its activities circumscribed at all as far as rivers and harbors work is concerned. It simply means a positive enlargement of the duties and responsibilities of the Corps of Engineers in a number of other directions where construction work is to be done.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri and Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT rose.

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield first to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The committee of which I am chairman originally handled this bill. Knowing the attitude of the other members of the committee, and in view of the fact that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] has just expressed himself, I do not see any objection to the gentleman's amendment. However, I would suggest that on page 36, line 20, he also strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may." That also applies to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. KETCHAM. That should be changed as well.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The gentleman wants to change it from "shall" to "may"?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT].

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. It is not the gentleman's idea to carry the supervision of this board so far as to say that they shall take charge of construction work of garages and matters of that kind, is it?

Mr. KETCHAM. It is not. The only thing I am seeking to accomplish by this amendment is to untie the hands of the administrator by relieving him of a distinct command in the word "shall" and give him the discretion that would be carried by the use of the word "may"; that he may use these services if it is desired. If we leave the language of the bill as it now is with the word "shall," his discretionary authority is sharply circumscribed.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The language of the bill reads:

The Administrator of Public Works shall utilize the services of the Corps of Engineers or the officers of the Corps of Engineers.

Why does not the gentleman strike out the words "of the Corps of Engineers" and leave in the words "the officers of the Corps of Engineers"? Does the gentleman not think those men could be put to work building post offices?

Mr. KETCHAM. I have a great deal of sympathy with the views expressed by the gentleman yesterday, but that is not the thing I am seeking to reach at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment. I move to strike out paragraphs (b) and (c) on pages 35 and 36.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I have a moment in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan? Gentlemen, I recognize that there seems to be a very slight difference between the word "shall" and the word "may." Of course, we are going to yield to the wishes of the committee, because we are not arbitrary in our views, but the thought of the Economy Committee was that we have a great many Army engineers whose services might be most valuable in supervising public construction. When we find an engineer whose services are not essential otherwise, and there is a road project on which he can be used, or his services can be utilized in connection with the construction of a bridge, or any public construction, then it should become the duty of this administrator to have that engineer proceed to supervise or direct that work. Of course such an engineer will act in a supervisory capacity. Now, why should he not be so employed? Why should you leave it discretionary if you really want to use the services of these highly trained men who are thoroughly capable of doing this work? Why should you refuse to say that they shall do it? That was the idea of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me lines 22, 23, and 24 give all the leeway necessary, provided you want to take advantage of these Army engineers.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman means that we should use their services?

Mr. SNELL. Exactly. The language is whenever and wherever practicable. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It seems to me that is broad enough, and I am glad the gentleman has made that observation.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I think all of us are very proud of the splendid work done by the engineers. Nevertheless, we know there is a disposition to crowd the Army engineers in on all kinds of work. I have no manner of question in my own mind but that when the appointment of the administrator is made it will be a very distinguished Army engineer. Then what would he do? I want to say to you that he would find more opportunity to make it practicable than you could imagine.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not agree with the gentleman at all.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Take, for instance, the case of the Bureau of Public Roads. This will give the administrator of public works the opportunity—and in effect direct him—to use Army engineers for examining and approving road projects.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Where it is practicable.

Mr. COLTON. The gentleman knows that there are great road organizations in all of the States. Would not the administrator take this as a direction that he should change the present set-up of the Bureau of Roads and use Army engineers?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not agree with the gentleman as to that conclusion.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for one statement?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. That would not apply to the Bureau of Public Roads throughout the country for the reason that the allotments are made to the several States and the roads are laid out and constructed in the several States under State direction. So this subdivision (b) would not apply.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Is it not true that two-thirds or three-fourths of the present engineers are civilian engineers?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think that may be true. I hope the committee will allow this language to remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offered a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to state he offered a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, as a substitute, I move to strike out all of paragraph (b), and on page 36, paragraph (c), line 16, commencing with the words "the Secretary," strike out the balance of paragraph (c).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. That is a motion to strike out. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of paragraph (b), commencing on page 35, and on page 36, paragraph (c), line 16, commencing with the words "the Secretary," strike out the balance of paragraph (c).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LaGUARDIA: Page 35, line 20, strike out all of paragraph (b), and on page 36, line 16, after the word "therein," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question as to whether or not there will be any economy under Title V? Does it not depend entirely on the President? Will the gentleman answer that?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will answer it, but do not take my time when I have only five minutes. We have had a night's rest and I think we can discuss a matter of this importance calmly without the gentleman from Texas getting unduly excited.

When we talk about labor we not only include the man with the pick and shovel, but we include skilled labor, engineering, and management, and here we are changing the whole policy of the Government in the construction of public works.

If it is the intention of the committee and the House to replace engineers and architects in civil life with Army and Navy officers, the House is free to vote such a fundamental change in policy, but let us know what we are doing. Under paragraph (b) the latitude is so broad and the direction in the law is so specific as to make it mandatory upon the Director of Public Works to first call in Army and Navy engineers, to the exclusion of all professional men in private life.

We must consider the hundreds and thousands of engineers and architects who have educated themselves at their own expense, who are established in their professions and who are entitled to some consideration in rendering services on public works. I submit that within a few years you would have exactly the same situation in respect of all public works as you have now in respect of rivers and harbors. If this is what the House desires to do, all right, but let the RECORD show that this section is so specific in its directions that the Administrator of Public Works would first have to utilize every available Army and Navy officer before a private architect or engineer could be given a retainer for public works.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. And the language in lines 21, 22, and 23 do not take away the mandatory provision as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] a few minutes ago.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Of course not, and it also permits them to call in sergeants of the Corps of Engineers or corporals and use them as foremen; and while the gentleman from Utah is on his feet, is it not true that the Committee on Expenditures considered this very proposition for seven weeks, and is it not true there was a minority report against any such provision in the bill?

Mr. COLTON. That is absolutely true.

Mr. SNELL. I admit it is not mandatory, but I supposed we were trying to put through here an economy measure to use the men that are already on the pay roll in preference to hiring some one outside.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Would the gentleman from New York use the Army cook school to put into a cheese factory—we have good chemists there?

Mr. SNELL. That is nothing like the proposition that we have before us.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It is the same thing. An officer in the Engineer Corps is not necessarily an engineer.

Mr. SNELL. Let us discuss the matter on its merits.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. SNELL. These engineers who are trained for specific work, in my judgment, should be used if we want economy. If we do not want economy, then vote it out.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But our experience has been that it is not economical, that they are slower in the preparation of their diagrams and plans and specifications. The cost of river and harbor work is the complete answer to that.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I submit this provision ought to be voted down.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 502 and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York has gone a little too far in his argument with respect to what this section would do. The gentleman goes all the way down to the enlisted men and the cooks and states it would be possible to use them. The fact of the matter is that efforts were made when this bill was under consideration by the Expenditures Committee to put the entire administration under the engineers of the Army. The committee very wisely refused to approve such a plan.

You have the engineers of the Army and the commissioned personnel of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy, and the Government is paying these officers large salaries to perform work for the Government. The Engineer Corps of the Army and the commissioned personnel of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy must secure some training to be of value in time of war. Both are most important arms of our national defense.

Now, what do you want them to do—sit in their barracks and hold their hands—or do you want them to perform some service to the United States for which they are now paid?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The Corps of Engineers consists of over 5,000 enlisted men. Are you going to use the enlisted men?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely not. There is no intention of that.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will read the language, he will find that they could use them, and the Corps of Engineers consists of 5,000 men.

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will yield, right along that line, under the language of this section, you could use those 5,000 enlisted men to build a post office if they saw fit to do so.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not agree with the gentlemen from Michigan and Massachusetts. Now I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the language of this bill is used in all river and harbor work?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Mississippi is correct.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment to make sure the definite statement that he has made?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What is the amendment that the gentleman proposes?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Page 35, line 21, strike out the words "of the Corps of Engineers," and have it read, "shall utilize the services of officers of the Corps of Engineers."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Personally, I have no objection to such an amendment, if that will satisfy the opposition. I have no desire to touch any man in the Engineer Corps except to have the officer render some service for which he is being paid.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If it is agreeable to other members of the committee, I will be pleased to offer the amendment. I am as anxious as any other Member to make sure the enlisted men in the Corps of Engineers do not get in this set-up. They have no place here and I can not conceive that they would be used, under the language contained in the bill.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of section 502 as a pro forma amendment, to get some information from the gentleman from South Dakota. I am very much interested in the building of minor roads and trails in the Forest Service, and I feel sure that the Forest Service can build these roads and trails much cheaper. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he understands that under the provisions of 502 (a) the work now being done by the Forest Service on roads and trails will come under the bureau of public works?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The Administration of Public Works will be composed of such construction activities as the President may consolidate. As far as the Bureau of Forestry is concerned, it will occupy the same relation to the Administration of Public Works as it now occupies to the Bureau of Public Roads. There is no intention of taking the construction of forest roads and trails away from the Forest Service. If the Forestry Service of the Department of Agriculture is in need of technical engineering services in the construction of forest roads, it now calls upon the Bureau of Public Roads for the engineering skill required. The same will be true with respect to the Public Works Administration. It is essentially a service organization which will be at the disposal of every other department for such construction as it requires. It is not intended, and the bill does not contemplate, that the new administration shall take over minor construction projects that are merely incidental to the proper functioning of some other bureau of the Government. Roads and trails are incidental to fire protection, and their construction will undoubtedly continue with the Forest Service, except for major projects, if any, where expert roads engineers may be required.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield? I want to see if this will be acceptable. I will offer an amendment striking out on page 35, line 21, the words "of the Corps of Engineers or," which will remove the objection of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLTON. That will help some; but, nevertheless, the whole debate this morning has shown the danger with which we are confronted.

This whole subject was considered for many weeks by the Committee on Expenditures; and here in a few moments we are, with little debate, writing permanent law which will have a far-reaching effect on the building activities of this country. These building activities include roads, public buildings, and many others of a similar nature.

For instance, the gentleman claimed a few moments ago that the road projects were engineered in the various States. That is true. The Bureau of Public Roads, however, supervises and passes upon all work, and no project is accepted on which Federal aid is expended until the Bureau of Public Roads passes on it. Under this provision of the bill we are saying that this work may be done by the Corps of Engineers of the Army. I have great respect for the Army engineers; but we also have an efficient Bureau of Roads. They are doing their work well. They are acquainted with road-building activities in every State of the Union. They have experts in all lines of road building; and, with due respect for the Army, are more expert in building roads. They are acquainted with road commissions in all of the States, and no one is complaining that they are wasting money.

Now we propose to grant authority to make a complete change, with no hearing or nothing on which to base such action. It all shows that we ought not to take matters of such tremendous importance and legislate upon them in this way. This bill covers so many subjects. We have not the time, we have not the opportunity to consider them as they should properly be considered.

I hope the interpretation of the language of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] will be accepted. Because of the position he has taken I shall not offer an amendment. I had in mind to offer an amendment to this effect:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to minor roads and trails and other improvements for the protection and administration of the national forests.

If the gentleman's interpretation is correct, it is unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on many subjects the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is as sane as a philosopher, and his judgment thereon is good, but on the foolish question of the Government employing and furnishing jobs for everybody, he is as wild as a March hare. [Laughter.] And when I say that, I am talking about one of my friends.

The gentleman from New York would have this Government employ and give a fat job to every engineer in the United States. He would have the Government of the United States employ and give a fat job to every architect in the Nation. He would have the Government employ at big wages every painter and every bricklayer and every hod carrier and every financier in the United States.

The Government can not do that. I want the Government of the United States to employ just as few people as possible, not just as many. [Applause.] This is the people's government. The people have to pay its bills. The Government of the United States does not owe a job to anybody. All it owes is protection and equal opportunity, so that all may have an equal chance to get jobs. The Government of the United States ought to stop handing out jobs. The taxpayers are getting tired of paying Government salaries.

If we can use in Government business these highly trained Army engineers on whom we spend $13,000 merely in putting them through the academy and then $25,000 more on intensive education after they come out, we ought to use every mother's son of them on every Government work in the Nation. The private architects that were employed on this Hoover Department of Commerce Building had fees paid to them that are simply outrageous. The big fees that this Republican administration has paid outside consulting architects on every big building that this Government has constructed stink to high heaven, and we ought to stop it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman would not yield to me, but I am more courteous to my friends than is the gentleman, and I shall gladly yield to him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I think the gentleman is more courteous than I. The gentleman the other day made one of the most forceful arguments I ever heard.

Mr. BLANTON. All of my arguments are forceful.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As to lawyers who had had no experience. These men in the Engineer Corps are not engineers, they have had no engineering experience except on rivers and harbors.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, we have the finest engineers in the world in the United States Army, and we ought to use them. This whole Title V, which seeks to create another big bureau, ought to go out of this bill. I am not in favor of creating another bureau. I am in favor of abolishing these useless bureaus that are fettering the Public Treasury and causing deficit after deficit. It is all left to the President, and we have learned by sad experience that we can not trust him to effect any real economy whatsoever.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not want any "beer" injected in this speech. If the President wants to, under this provision he can consolidate, and if he does not want to, he can create one of the biggest, highest-priced bureaus in the history of the Government, which will cause much additional expense. When he prepared his special reconstruction bill for us to pass, the limitation that we put on the salaries of $10,000 he had stricken from the bill, so that he could have appointed high-salaried officials. That is an emergency bureau, and right now, out of that tax fund, they are paying as high as $16,000 a year salaries.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am talking about more serious matters than the gentleman has in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I agreed to offer a few minutes ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 35, line 21, after the word "of" strike out the words "the Corps of Engineers, or" and on page 36 strike out all of line 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on Title V and all amendments thereto, close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWING: Page 34, strike out section 501.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to defend this House and Congress against the charge that it is proceeding without due regard to all possible proper economies, and before I complete my statement I will refer to what Congress is actually doing in the way of cutting the Budget in amounts that will probably aggregate around $600,000,000. But, notwithstanding this, I call your attention to the fact that organized propaganda is being put out by big business in an effort to excite the people of the country against Congress and turn them against their own Government.

I hold in my hand three letters, one sent out by the Commercial Investment Trust Co., of New York, another by the Du Pont Co., of Delaware, and another by the Standard Oil Co. of California. Notwithstanding the fact that these companies are located in widely separated parts of the country the letters are identical, figure for figure and word for word. After referring to the breakdown of industry, increased unemployment and want, the letters proceed to say:

Your Senators and Congressmen are in a position to know whether a continuation of this deplorable condition is necessary.

And urge their stockholders to get their friends and their chambers of commerce to immediately write their Congressmen saying, "The future of industry and employment will be affected by your action."

Think of the brazen effrontery of these big corporations trying to transfer from their own to our shoulders the blame for present business and economic conditions, for which the bad practices of big business are solely responsible. This same crowd has all along insisted that nothing must be done to retard or in any way restrict the free concentration of great wealth in the hands of the few, until to-day 90 per cent of the purchasing power is in the hands of those who possess less than 10 per cent of the consuming power, with the resulting breakdown of the normal relation of consumption to production.

Wall Street for years picked the pockets of honest American investors, selling them stocks and bonds at highly inflated and artificially created prices while the international bankers bled this country white of its money, sending billions out of the country in exchange for worthless foreign securities.

And after the inevitable crash came, what have these so-called captains of industry done toward putting their house in order? They have given a most pitiable exhibition of their utter inability to meet a crisis of their own making. And yet, they now undertake to throw the blame on us, in order to protect themselves from criticism for the condition in which the country is.

Furthermore, it is untrue that the future of industry or the relief of unemployment can be assured by any cuts we can make in Government expenses by this bill. On a moment's reflection it is obvious that even if we could suddenly suspend every Federal tax for one full year, it would not, it could not end the depression, because its origin lies deep in our present economic system. The man who promises to restore prosperity by cutting is like the doctor of long ago who promised to restore health by bleeding. Business is anæmic, and any further restriction of the circulating medium may prove fatal to the patient.

However, whether wisely or not, the Government expenses are being drastically cut. To begin with, let me say that the President cut the Budget more than $350,000,000 under last year's expenses. Then this House cut that 5 per cent. Then the Senate cut that 10 per cent, with the result that without regard to what we do with reference to this so-called economy bill, if the present policy of Congress is followed through, and apparently it will be, there will be a cutting by Congress under what the President thought was the lowest amount the Government could get along with, of approximately $600,000,000.

I resent the effort of big business to try to save its hide from the righteous anger of the public by diverting the indignation of the people from itself and its own misconduct and its own utter failure to put its own house in order, to Congress and the American Government, and trying to make us appear responsible for conditions for which it is solely responsible. It is a strange thing that big business never thought of demanding this extreme economy in Government appropriations until it first wheedled Congress out of the $2,000,000,000 which it wanted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to have available for its own use and benefit. [Applause.]

The letter referred to in my remarks is as follows:

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO.,
Wilmington, Del., April 8, 1932.

To the Stockholders, Employees, and Friends of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.:

The situation at Washington deserves your active and immediate attention. The National Government is spending more money every year than the previous year, and you are one of those who must eventually pay the bill.

According to the December estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, the expenditures of the major departments and commissions of the National Government will, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, exceed by $1,231,100,000 those of 1927, when industrial activity was nearly at its peak and when prices of substantially all commodities and services were considerably above those of to-day.

The following tabulation, prepared from the latest annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sets forth a comparison of governmental expenditures by main subdivisions for the fiscal years 1927 and 1932:

[Figures to nearest hundred thousands]

	1927	1932	Amount of increase	Per cent increase
Total expenditures	$3,493,600,000	$4,482,200,000	$988,600,000	28
Less interest and sinking fund payments (statutory)	1,120,500,000	1,016,800,000	[1] 103,700,000	[1] 9
Less miscellaneous not included in budgets of major departments	409,100,000	270,300,000	[1] 138,800,000	[1] 34
	1,964,000,000	3,195,100,000	1,231,100,000	63
Balance which was expended by major departments, commissions, etc., as follows:
Department of Agriculture	156,300,000	333,500,000	177,200,000	113
Agricultural marketing fund—net (Farm Board)		155,000,000	155,000,000
Post Office deficit	27,300,000	195,000,000	167,700,000	614
Treasury Department	151,600,000	312,900,000	161,300,000	106
War Department	360,800,000	483,700,000	122,900,000	34
Navy Department	318,900,000	378,900,000	60,000,000	19
Shipping Board	19,000,000	60,800,000	41,800,000	220
Department of Justice	24,800,000	53,800,000	29,000,000	117
Department of Commerce	30,900,000	54,700,000	23,800,000	77
Other independent offices and commissions	35,400,000	57,600,000	22,200,000	63
Legislative establishment	19,700,000	32,400,000	12,700,000	64
Department of Labor	9,900,000	14,100,000	4,200,000	42
Adjusted-Service-Certificate Fund	115,200,000	200,000,000	84,800,000	74
Veterans' Bureau (Veterans' Administration since 1930)	391,500,000	784,400,000	[2] 392,900,000	100
Interior Department	302,700,000	78,300,000	[1] [2] 224,400,000	[1] 74
Total of major departments, commissions, etc.	1,964,000,000	3,195,100,000	1,231,100,000	63

[1] Indicates decrease.

[2] Since the Bureau of Pensions was transferred from the Interior Department to the Veterans' Bureau in 1931, in order to make a fair comparison with 1927 it is necessary to combine the expenditures of the Interior Department and the Veterans' Bureau for each period, which results in an increase in expenditures in those 2 divisions of $168,500,000 for 1932 as compared with 1927.

To finance these ever-increasing disbursements Congress is now planning huge additional taxes to be paid out of the already shrunken income of prostrate industry and individuals.

Taxes levied upon corporations and other producers increase the cost of their products. Higher costs lessen sales, slow down industry, increase unemployment and want—all of which drive costs still higher and further increase distress.

Taxes upon individuals have a similar effect by curtailing their capacity to purchase the products of industry.

It is lower costs and higher purchasing power which we need to-day perhaps more than ever in our history. Why are industries and individuals, which must reduce their expenditures to meet the depressed conditions, saddled with ever-mounting taxes to cover the ever-increasing expenditures of the National Government? Why should the confidence in the financial security of the Government itself be jeopardized by extravagance? Why does not Congress balance the National Budget by reduction of expenditures through efficient operation and the curtailment of nonessential services and functions?

Since the ways and means of curtailing governmental expenditures are the responsibility of Congress, these questions should be answered by Congress. Your Senators and Congressmen are in a position to know whether the continuance of this deplorable condition is necessary. The future of industry and employment will be affected by your action. If you feel as I do, make your feelings known immediately to your political representatives directly through your friends, your newspapers, your chamber of commerce, your trade associations, or other groups or individuals in a position to impress Congress.

L. DU PONT, President.

Mr. SWING. The comparison of expenditures used in the Du Pont letter has been analyzed and shown to present an unfair picture by the Director of the Budget in the following statement:

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, April 30, 1932.

Hon. PHILIP D. SWING,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SWING: In accordance with our telephone conversation this morning I am inclosing herewith copy of the memorandum which I read to you over the phone.

Sincerely yours,

J. CLAWSON ROOP, Director.

MEMORANDUM

APRIL 27, 1932.

In a recent printed circular letter issued from the executive offices of a prominent industrial corporation comparison is made between the Federal expenditures of the fiscal year 1927 and the estimated expenditures of the fiscal year 1932. The letter deducts from the total expenditures of each of the two years the interest on the public-debt and sinking-fund payments, together with certain miscellaneous items, and arrives at balances expended by the major departments and commissions, etc., of $1,964,000,000 for 1927 against $3,195,100,000 for 1932, an increase of $1,231,100,000.

It is to be noted that the comparison is made between a year in which expenditures were the lowest since 1917 and the estimated expenditures of a peak year when unusual expenditures were being made during the emergency in the interest of agriculture and in aiding employment through an extensive enlargement of the public-works program, increased vessel and aircraft construction, and similar activities involving employment in various departments. For example, in 1927 the expenditures for public works were approximately $188,000,000; the estimated expenditures for that purpose in 1932 are $623,000,000, an increase of $435,000,000. This public-works item includes the Federal-aid highway system in the Department of Agriculture, the enlarged public-building program in the Treasury Department, as well as river and harbor and flood-control work and other nonmilitary construction activities in the War Department.

Other increases over 1927 are: Agricultural marketing fund, $155,000,000; postal deficiency, $167,000,000; vessel construction and alteration in the Navy and Shipping Board construction loans, $75,000,000; aircraft construction and aeronautical activities in the Army, Navy, and Department of Commerce, $47,000,000; care of veterans, including adjusted-service certificate fund, $246,000,000; settlement of war claims act, 1928, in the Treasury, $37,000,000. These increases account for substantially the whole of the increase of $1,231,100,000 referred to in the letter with the exception of about $69,000,000, which represents the net amount of increases and decreases scattered throughout the various departments and is largely for such purposes as aids to agriculture, strengthening the activities of the Department of Justice in the detection and prosecution of crimes, in providing better facilities at penal institutions, increased expenses of the Department of Commerce in completing the decennial census of 1930, immigration and naturalization activities in the Department of Labor, etc.

Because of these unusual activities in the fiscal year 1932, a fairer comparison with the 1927 figures is the estimated expenditures for 1923 as contained in the Budget submitted in December last. Using the same items as were used in the comparison of 1932, the increase would be approximately $772,000,000 as compared with $1,231,100,000. Looking into the causes of this increase, as is done above in 1932, the increase is accounted for by approximately $273,000,000 in public works; $15,000,000, agricultural marketing fund; $128,000,000, postal deficiency; $45,000,000, vessel construction and alterations in the Navy and Shipping Board construction loans; $36,000,000, aircraft construction and aeronautical activities in the Army, Navy, and Department of Commerce; and $243,000,000, care of veterans, including adjusted-service certificate fund, leaving an increase in 1933 of only $32,000,000, which represents net amount of small increases and decreases throughout the departments for purposes similar to those indicated in the miscellaneous increase of $69,000,000 referred to in the preceding paragraph for 1932.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The Economy Committee was created to promote economies in the Government. We have under consideration the bill reported by the committee and it consists of 10 titles.

Its important provisions are reduction in the salaries of Federal employees, legislation affecting personnel, miscellaneous provisions for economy, reorganization of executive departments, creation of a Public Works Administration, creation of a Department of National Defense, special consolidations, interdepartmental economies and provisions applicable to veterans. Several of the titles deal with legislation that should not be considered in an economy program. The creation of new offices and any economies resulting are speculative.

ECONOMY

The most important title in the bill and the real opportunity for economy is in the reduction of the salaries of Federal employees. The Federal Budget is approximately $4,000,000,000. One-half of this Budget is for fixed charges, while more than one-third of it covers the salaries of Federal employees.

Federal salaries aggregate $1,341,670,730. A 10 per cent reduction will result in a saving of approximately $135,000,000. It is said that the minimum salaries and compensation should not be reduced. I am interested in those who receive small salaries. The action of the committee respecting small salaries meets my approval. It is to be remembered that the vast majority of those receiving salaries and compensation of $1,000 and less are furnished their subsistence by the Government. They do not have to pay rent nor do they have to pay for their meals.

Where actual living expenses are paid by the Government there is an opportunity for saving.

Those who oppose salary reductions insist that the buying power of Federal employees will be reduced and that there will be a delay in the return to normal conditions, but the dollar to-day will purchase, generally, as much as $1.50 would purchase three years ago. The purchasing power of Federal employees will be relatively larger in the event the reductions proposed by the Economy Committee are adopted than the purchasing power of similar employees in private life.

There is much dissatisfaction in the country to-day. People feel that they are called upon to economize personally while there is no reduction in governmental costs. An emergency confronts the Nation. Federal employees have had no reductions in salaries during the past two years, while those in private employment have had reductions from 10 to 50 per cent.

It is said that business and big business will follow the example of the Government. The reply is that business and commerce have already reduced salaries. States have reduced salaries. I recall the anomalous and contradictory instance during the debate of one city that has reduced materially the salaries of its city employees where the mayor is asking Congress to make no reduction of salaries of Federal employees in that city. This is a fair illustration of the fallacy in the arguments of those who oppose reduction of salaries.

Those who oppose reductions in salaries argue that the standard of living will be reduced. If the dollar is worth $1.50, the standard of living has been raised 50 per cent among Federal employees during the depression. If such argument is permitted to obtain, the way to promote prosperity would be to increase Federal salaries rather than reduce them. The only way to pay salaries is to tax citizens. If those who oppose reduction are sound in their reasoning, the way to promote prosperity would be to increase taxes during the depression.

FALLACY

States and cities have reduced salaries. Salaries have been reduced in private employment. The sound thinking and the clear reasoning of the country approve salary reductions in all walks of life because living expenses have been reduced. The purchasing power of the dollar has increased. Can it be that citizens in all the walks of life, can it be that public officials in municipalities and counties, can it be that governors and members of State legislatures are wrong when they advocate economy, retrenchment, and reductions of salaries? Can it be that everybody in the United States except the Members of Congress opposing reductions is dead wrong in demanding reduction of salaries of Federal employees? Has it come to pass that some Members of Congress alone are infallible in dealing with economic conditions? Have we reached the point where we must disregard the sound thought of the patriotic citizenship of the Nation in this time of stress?

What is the situation with respect to Federal employees? It is a question of a reduction in salaries or the discharge and elimination of tens of thousands of employees. Which is the fairer way, which is the better way, a reduction that affects all or a slash that destroys many?

Moreover, I am always in sympathy with a fair wage and a reasonable salary. The laborer is always worthy of his hire. Federal employees had a right to ask for an increase in their salaries in prosperous times. If they now oppose a decrease in abnormal times, what right would they have to advocate an increase in prosperous times?

We might as well face the facts. Some are opposing reductions in the salaries of Federal employees on the theory that there are other titles in the bill that will effect economies. Of course, there are some other items in the bill that will promote economies, but in many cases the economies are purely speculative. The creation of new departments, the establishment of new staffs, and the appointment of additional officers will not promote economy. At best, I repeat, such economies are doubtful. There will be no real economies unless salaries are reduced.

I resent any insinuation or statement that Federal employees are unpatriotic. I deny that they are unwilling to share in the burdens of the Government. Citizens are being taxed more than ever. Surely Federal employees would be less than patriotic if they decline cheerfully to share in the economies of Government in the greatest of all depressions. [Applause.]

The Classification Board of the Federal Government has made careful investigations. They report that Federal employees receiving salaries of $2,000 and less are receiving larger compensation than is paid for comparable work in private employment. Personally, I believe in graduated taxes. I believe in graduated reductions in salaries. I should like to see greater percentage of reductions in the larger salaries. I know that all legislation is the result of compromise. I think that all employees should really share in the reduction. However, I am willing to go along with the committee. I know that there must be economies, and I trust that on a record vote the reductions recommended by the Economy Committee will be approved and restored.

DUPLICATION

Many who oppose reduction in Federal salaries advocate the elimination of duplication. What do they mean? Duplication and waste involve one or more departments doing the same or similar work. What does elimination mean? It can mean nothing more nor less than the reduction of the number of Federal employees. Those who oppose overlapping are utterly inconsistent when they oppose reduction. If our sympathy for those who may lose employment is to get the better of our judgment, there will never be any elimination of waste and duplication. Waste and duplication mean unnecessary Federal employees. Let us stop and think. If we mean to match our preachments with our deeds, there is no escape from the conclusion that we must face the issue. Federal salaries must be reduced, and they must be reduced to the point where the taxpayer will be relieved. I maintain that there should be adjustments, and adjustments with reductions that should aggregate from $75,000,000 to $135,000,000.

I come now to the pending title. Much was said a few minutes ago about the meaning of the term "Corps of Engineers" in paragraph (b) of section 502. The language of the section is the language generally used in river and harbor acts. When we speak of the Corps of Engineers of the Army in public works we mean the officers of the Corps of Engineers. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] clarifies probably but does not change the meaning of the paragraph. The intent and purpose of the committee that originally reported the bill are still clear and evident.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Title V provides for the creation of a Public Works Administration. It is the bill reported by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. There has been much agitation for this legislation. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Two bills were considered by this committee. Extensive hearings were conducted. I believe that as a general policy it is well to play safe in periods of distress. The creation of new departments ordinarily means the expenditure of additional public moneys. We oppose additional bureaus and we denounce additional commissions. We are asked here to create another independent executive department. The better policy is that all administrative work should be under a Cabinet head. Independent establishments are more conducive to extravagance and contribute more to the dangers of bureaucracy than any features of our Government. I think it is a fair conclusion, from the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures, that there are certain improvements that can be made in the construction of public works. There is certain duplication, and there are instances where the overhead can be reduced. Economies can be promoted. I doubt, however, that the creation of an independent establishment without responsibility to any member of the Cabinet is the solution of the problem. However, as a compromise, I am supporting the bill.

The public works of the Federal Government have grown in importance. They have developed particularly in certain departments. There are, however, two departments of the Government that have had supervision of most of the public works. These are the Treasury Department, in which the Supervising Architect constructs public buildings, and the War Department, in which the Corps of Engineers has been charged with the improvement of rivers and harbors with navigation, and flood control. It is worthy of note in passing that no work by the Supervising Architect and the Corps of Engineers has been tainted with fraud or corruption. When the United States departed from the policy of having public buildings constructed by the Treasury Department, there was extravagance. We recall the fraud and corruption in the administration of veterans' affairs 8 or 10 years ago. It is better to profit by such experiences than to run the risk of extravagance by establishing a new department when there should be economy on every hand. We had better economize than to enlarge with probably increased expenditures.

DUPLICATIONS

The chief duplications in public construction are the public works by the Veterans' Administration, by the Department of Justice, and by the Department of the Interior that could profitably and economically be transferred to the Treasury Department.

There are certain construction works now conducted by other departments that could be transferred to the War Department and executed by the Corps of Engineers. There is no reason why the Bureau of Public Roads, the Geological Survey, and the Reclamation Service should not be transferred to the Corps of Engineers.

Economies in the pending title are somewhat speculative. Independent establishments promote extravagances. They mean additional staffs and additional personnel. They mean additional organizations. The better plan is to place departments under Cabinet officers.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Navigation, rivers and harbors, and flood control are under the supervision of the Corps of Engineers. The Corps of Engineers is an important part of the Army. It is the construction department in time of war. There must be buildings, there must be bridges, and there must be highways for the successful prosecution of war. Under our representative government the officers of the Army should be trained in preparation for war and should be utilized in the Government. Navigation is essential to the winning of war. There must be adequate harbors at all ports and there must be navigation in the main waterways.

In all of its history the Corps of Engineers has been jealous of its good name. Its record is above reproach. It is and has been most efficient. No other agency of the Government now does the work performed by the Corps of Engineers. Why change? There is no duplication. Mere change is not progress. Motion is not advancement. Change is not improvement. I maintain that we should continue to utilize the Corps of Engineers in the services of the Government.

There is training in engineering at West Point. The honor graduates of West Point most frequently enter the Corps of Engineers and take postgraduate courses in the best engineering schools of the United States and other countries. The members of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army are the most proficient engineers in the construction of river and harbor improvements, in the building of flood-control works, and in the improvement of navigation in the world.

GOVERNMENT ENGINEERS

Congress is repeatedly asked to appropriate large sums of money for internal improvements. There is much propaganda for appropriations for internal improvement. Flood control is a national problem. The advantages are sometimes local and sometimes national. There is the matter of reclamation and irrigation. There is the utilizing of water power of the United States. Selfish interests would obtain control of all the great water-power resources. It is important that the Government have careful and competent engineers, who are impartial, to furnish Congress and the country with accurate engineering facts and statistics in the consideration of all questions of internal improvement. The Corps of Engineers should be preserved for this very purpose.

I am thoroughly familiar with the title for the establishment of a department of public works. Personally, my solution of the problem would be to utilize the agencies of the Government that have had the most experience in public-works construction and to correlate such work so as to prevent duplication and overlapping.

I urge that there should be three engineering and construction organizations in the Government, under the Corps of Engineers, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and the Bureau of Yards and Docks in the Navy. The building activities of the Government should center around these three departments. Economy would result by transferring to the War Department, to be supervised by the Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Public Roads, the water-resource branch of the Geological Survey, the mapping activities of the Geological Survey, the Reclamation Service, the Bureau of Lighthouses, the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, the Federal Power Commission, and the Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska.

There should be transferred to the Treasury Department, to be administered by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, all construction work now performed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, all construction work now performed by the Department of Justice, and all construction work now performed by the Veterans' Administration. There should be transferred to the Navy Department the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

My solution would eliminate all independent departments. It would utilize existing agencies. It would promote economy.

The solution that I propose is embodied in a bill which I have introduced, H. R. 11715, which is substantially the same as the bill H. R. 11178, introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

I am supporting the department of public works construction for the reason that the three essential departments of construction are preserved. The administrator of public works will really take the place of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. Army and Navy construction will be continued. The integrity of the corps will be preserved.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in sympathy with this section in the bill to create a public-works administration and to consolidate and coordinate the public works of the United States, but it seems to me there is something else lacking, that this is a mere gesture if we go ahead and establish a public-works department and then do not provide some means to relieve unemployment in the United States. There are 8,000,000 of unemployed; there are many millions more on part time; there are millions more who are scared to death that they are about to lose their jobs. Members of Congress have been deaf, dumb, and blind to these facts that are known to everybody in the United States. We have done practically nothing to relieve human misery which stalks throughout the Nation, yet the Congress refuses to recognize the existence of appalling unemployment and the most acute and distressing economic condition that has ever confronted the American people. We have proposed nothing, and yet every newspaper and every person in the country is talking about unemployment, which is the biggest and most important issue in the United States. All that Congress has done up to date was to donate 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to partially relieve hunger and undernourishment. The American wage earners are not asking for charity or doles; what they want is work and wages and a square deal for labor.

Soviet Russia, with $200,000,000, or less, in gold, is able to set up an enormous public-works program, but we hesitate to spend a dollar or even to plan in advance for an emergency building program. The policy of the Nation should be to spend millions or billions if necessary for public works but not a cent for doles. We are still the richest nation in the world, yet we have done nothing to even attempt to relieve unemployment, and I propose that the Congress of the United States after three or four months of session should spend a little time to consider ways and means of relieving unemployment in this country.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sure the gentleman does not want to object to discussing the question of unemployment. That comes ahead of the question of economy, or at least should be considered at the same time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not at all; but we must get along with this bill.

Mr. FISH. I have only five minutes and part of it is already gone.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to this section of the bill.

Mr. FISH. I have but five minutes, whereas the gentleman has spoken many times. The gentleman himself might save a little time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But I spoke to the bill.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has taken up a lot of time. I can not yield just now.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the section.

Mr. FISH. I am discussing the question of public works.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed in order. I am discussing the question of public works. That is what is needed in the United States, not merely an administration of public works, but public works themselves; and I propose to offer the following resolution. It will take but one minute to read it, and I hope no one will object. I am going to ask the Rules Committee for immediate consideration of it, and not only ask, but demand, consideration in behalf of 8,000,000 unemployed Americans and of many millions of others who are interested, the American Federation of Labor, the veterans' organizations, and many civic, fraternal, and church groups, and of most of the women's organizations, as private and municipal relief is almost exhausted and we must plan immediately for a 2-year public-works program, backed by a bond issue of $1,000,000,000. Such a plan must not permit the expenditure of a cent on public works that are not needed or will create a further overproduction in any commodities in which there is already an overproduction. I would appreciate support from all those who are interested in a constructive public-works program to relieve unemployment, to help in securing speedy and favorable action on the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to appoint a special committee of five Members of the House, whose duty it shall be to immediately survey needed public works, such as post office and other Federal buildings, construction and maintenance of highways, and improvement of rivers and harbors, and Federal projects that will not create further overproduction of basic commodities, with authority to report to the House at any time with recommendations for a 2-year plan for emergency construction of public works throughout the United States to relieve unemployment. Said committee shall submit an estimate of the cost of each project contained in its recommendations, an estimate of the number of workmen to be employed on each project, and the ways and means of financing the projects recommended in its report.

Resolved further, That the special committee shall have the power to investigate the advantages of the 40-hour work week, or fewer hours of labor per day on public works, and recommend a definite plan to relieve the present distressing economic conditions by providing for the employment of a maximum number of unemployed American workmen on Federal works.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, neither the President, Members of the House and Senate, nor any other officers and employees of the Government have a vested right or indefeasible title to the office or position he or she holds. They are all mere agents, employees, attorneys, in fact, or, if you please, servants of the United States Government. They hold their positions at the will of the Government and people. The Government has the legal and moral right to fix their wages, which I am sure will always be liberal and reasonable and such as to justify faithful and efficient service.

We have on the Government pay rolls more than 1,000,000 men and women, or 1 person in every 125 of our population is drawing a salary from the Government. These salaries aggregate $1,300,000,000. Excluding the personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, the civil list contains the names of approximately 800,000 persons, whose annual salaries exceed $1,000,000,000. The pending economy bill, if enacted in the form in which it was introduced, will effect the saving of at least $200,000,000 in our Government expenses. After exempting the first $1,000, the bill would save $67,000,000 in salaries. I voted against the Britten amendment to exempt salaries of $2,500 or less because that amendment cuts the life out of the bill, as 74 per cent of all Federal salaries are under $2,500 annually. The Britten amendment costs us $55,000,000, as it reduces the salary savings from $67,000,000 to $12,000,000. So, if you are going to exempt all salaries of $2,500 and under, you might as well exempt the others.

In voting to exempt only the first $1,000 of salary, I think I was fair, not only to the public but to the Federal employees as well, as under that exemption the reduction would not be burdensome to anyone, and certainly every Government employee wants to contribute something to relieve the present unprecedented emergency. Everybody must help in this crisis.

Congressional salaries and salaries of Government employees in excess of $1,000 should and must be reduced all along the line during this present emergency period. Poor as I am, I am glad to take a reduction in my salary, although I strive to earn every dollar of it; and I believe every other patriotic person in the Government service will cheerfully accept such reductions as may be just and proper under existing unprecedented conditions.

The proposed reduction is not burdensome in the low-salaried positions, in some of which the present salary is not excessive, but those in higher-salaried positions should be and are called upon to make a more substantial contribution. As a sincere friend of the Federal employees, and as one who has in season and out of season championed the cause of fair wages, proper working conditions, and modern standards of living, I make bold to say that the present and future interests and financial welfare of Federal employees will be promoted by the willingness and cheerfulness on their part to contribute their mite to pull Uncle Sam out of the quicksands of insolvency. As they have shared in the Nation's prosperity, I am sure they want a part in the necessary and all-important task of relieving its present financial distress.

The Government has been good to its employees. Many of the present salaries would not be excessive if business and economic conditions were normal, but under present calamitous conditions Government employees are better paid and have much more desirable positions than those who perform similar services in the commercial, industrial, and professional fields. Then again, these Federal positions are, as a rule, permanent, with assurance of liberal retirement benefits when age separates them from the service. Governments, like individuals, enjoy periods of prosperity and experience times of depression. After eating the white cake of prosperity for years, we should be willing occasionally to take a slice of the black bread of adversity, especially if our paymaster, the United States Government, is in economic distress. By cheerfully submitting to a moderate reduction in salaries during this period of national emergency, the Federal employees will not only do the just and proper thing, but they will thereby create a spirit of good will on the part of the public the future value of which to the employees can not be computed in dollars and cents.

Because of a bankrupt Treasury and the ever-increasing burden of taxation, there is a widespread demand for a substantial reduction in Government salaries. The masses of the American people believe that the million men and women who are on the Government pay rolls should make some contribution toward balancing our National Budget. If Government employees are wise, they will not disregard this condition of the public mind. The will of the people is the supreme law. Members of Congress, Government officials, and Government employees are agents or servants of the people. People pay the taxes out of which Government salaries are paid. And the people have not only legal but a moral right to regulate the salaries they pay their agents and employees.

Obviously the interest and welfare of Federal employees will be promoted by working in harmony with, rather than against, the will of the people. By the terms of the bill the proposed reduction is effective only for the year beginning July 1, 1932, and ending June 30, 1933. If the employees cheerfully accept the proposed cut, which is not unreasonable, they will by such attitude prevent a permanent, more drastic, radical and perhaps unreasonable reduction of their salaries.

I am convinced that Federal employees are making a very serious mistake and jeopardizing their future interests by opposing any and all reductions in Federal salaries. I believe I understand the sentiment of the American people on this question, and I fear an unwillingness on the part of the Government employees to contribute anything toward balancing the Budget and helping Uncle Sam get on his feet again, will awaken a spirit of resentment among the masses which will sooner or later compel a more radical and drastic reduction in Federal salaries. If the oak did not ever and anon bend to the winds that blow, it would be broken or uprooted by the tempest. We can not with safety disregard or ignore public sentiment on this or any other question, especially in periods of national emergency and peril such as now confront us.

The interests and financial welfare of all Government employees are inseparably bound up with the interests and welfare of the Government they serve. Federal employees are members of Uncle Sam's family and household. He has nurtured them, given them permanent employment under favorable working conditions, paid them, not princely but good salaries, granted liberal annual and sick leave, and provided generous retirement privileges. Now the head of the household is in financial distress. It is but natural that he should ask the members of his family, not to bear all of his burden, but to bear a part and be indulgent with him until he can get his financial affairs balanced. If those who sit at his table and enjoy his bounty will not respond to his appeal, then to whom can he turn?

We have built up in America in the last 100 years a bureaucratic system that not only subverts the fundamental principles and conceptions of those who established our constitutional Government, but, in the language of John C. Calhoun, a system that has grown so powerful that it arrogantly and contemptuously defies the Government that created it. [Applause.] Here in Washington, a power has risen up in the Government greater than the people themselves, consisting of many, and various, and powerful groups, combined into one mass by the cohesive power of self-interest. Congress has been in a state of siege since we began consideration of the economy bill.

We witnessed a few nights ago a lamentable spectacle in this Chamber when the galleries were filled with officers and employees of the Government, outpourings from the departments in Washington, members of Uncle Sam's household, beneficiaries of his bounty, by their presence and applause dominating, overawing, and insidiously influencing the action of this House. I gazed into that sea of faces and wondered if we had reached the point in our national life when Government officials and Government employees had become so numerous and powerful that they could dominate legislation and dictate their own salaries. As I looked on that scene, I was reminded of the time—and my illustration is not far-fetched—when during the decadent period of ancient Rome the officeholding classes and the Prætorian Guard raised and deposed emperors at will, and put the royal purple and scepter on the block, and auctioned off the Empire to the highest bidder.

I repeat that I am a sincere friend of the Government employees. I would deprive them of no fair and just compensation, but their salaries are not sacred in this period of national emergency. They are making a fatal mistake and committing an irretrievable blunder when they place themselves in the attitude of hostility against a fair and reasonable reduction in public pay rolls. [Applause.]

Federal employees are members of Uncle Sam's family circle. He has furnished them with what are practically life jobs and has paid many of them large salaries and all of them good salaries. He has certainly been a kind, indulgent, and agreeable master. Now Uncle Sam is in financial distress. He is unable to balance his Budget. For the first time in 150 years he has appealed to his employees to help him out of a bad situation.

Like the head of any other family, he comes to the members of his household, to his working force, and respectfully requests that each and all contribute something toward replenishing his bankrupt Treasury. Unless his employees heed his request, he can not continue to give them employment and pay their wages. He does not ask them to bear all of his burdens, or to make up the entire deficit; but he does what he has a right to do—he asks the beneficiaries of his generosity and the members of his own household to submit to a fair and reasonable temporary reduction in their salaries. [Applause.]

Because I am a friend of the Federal employees, I speak frankly, and I protest against their following an unwise and self-serving leadership, making the blunder of opposing a reasonable reduction in their salaries for the approaching fiscal year. They will prejudice their case if they place themselves in the attitude of hostility against a reasonable reduction in their salaries. Such action on their part defies public sentiment and will create a spirit of resentment among the masses of the overburdened American people, which I fear will result in the election of the next Congress under a mandate, not only to reduce salaries but to reduce them in a more drastic, radical, and permanent manner than is proposed under the present bill. [Applause.]

I know the dangers that now threaten certain groups of Federal employees. I am trying to protect them from a menace more serious than a slight temporary decrease in salary. I am frank with them, because I am their friend and have their interests at heart. Their true friends will fight their battles when they are right, and frankly tell them when they are wrong or when they are pursuing a policy that will in the end injure them and breed serious future troubles. The time will come—and it is not far distant—when the Federal employees will realize that their true friends are those who are trying to prevent them from doing an unwise thing, something that will tremendously injure them in the future. For the small amount involved in this temporary reduction the employees can not afford to create a spirit of lasting antagonism on the part of the Government and people that will embarrass and plague them for years. If there ever was a time when Federal employees should not lose their heads but should go along with the Government and people, that time is now.

I can not state too strongly that in this period of national emergency, Federal employees who oppose all salary reductions are standing in their own light, and will thereby create conditions that will ultimately result in more drastic reductions, and perhaps revolutionary changes in methods of Government service. If they defeat the salary reduction program, they will make it the one big issue in the coming campaign. I know of no class of our people who have more to gain by balancing Uncle Sam's Budget than the Federal employees. I have confidence in them and believe that on second and serious thought they will cheerfully contribute their part toward placing their employer, the United States Government, on a basis where he can continue to give them employment at good wages. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: On page 34, line 6, strike out Title V.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas) there were—ayes 20, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To what title?

Mr. JONES. A new title, Title V (a).

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment of that kind pending, which I offered on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, of course, knows it is not pending when he did not offer it. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 43, line 2, after the word "effect," insert a new title to be known as Title V(a) as follows:

"The President is authorized to abolish the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation, effective June 30, 1932, and to transfer its activities, powers, and operating funds to the United States Shipping Board except $1,938,240 of such operating funds, which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The substance of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas has already been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order if there is any doubt about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas on the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that was offered yesterday provided for completely abolishing the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation. Under this title—Title V—the President is authorized by executive order to transfer to the Administration of Public Works and consolidate and coordinate therein the whole or any part of all bureaus, agencies, activities, and services of the Government. This amendment simply authorizes the President to abolish the United States Shipping Board and the Federal Trade Commission. The amendment covers an authorization for the abolishment of the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation, effective July 1, 1932. The former amendment would have abolished it, as a matter of law. This amendment simply authorizes the President to abolish it and it follows the title as a new title, which authorizes the President to consolidate in whole or in part certain bureaus. Then it is followed—the whole amendment was not read—by subdivision (b) which authorizes the President to abolish the Federal Trade Commission effective June 30, 1932, and to transfer the unexpended funds of that commission to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

As I understood the point of order, it was simply leveled at the fact that the same amendment was offered on yesterday. If there is any further point of order under consideration by the Chair, I would be willing to discuss that.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What is the difference in practical accomplishment in getting rid of the vermiform appendix by the gentleman's amendment and the other provision?

Mr. JONES. I do not care how it is done, but there is a vast difference from a parliamentary standpoint in abolishing a bureau or department as a matter of law and authorizing the President to do the same thing.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What is the advance in the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. JONES. It authorizes the President to absolutely abolish the board; and would that the will of the Congress be it should be abolished. It gives an expression of sentiment on the part of the House that the United States Merchant Fleet Corporation should be abolished as well as the Federal Trade Commission, the activities of the Merchant Fleet Corporation being transferred to the United States Shipping Board, which is another branch of the same thing. Why should there be a shipping board and a fleet corporation, when both have to do with operating a fleet? Why have two bureaus, two sets of officers, two sets of lawyers? Oh, I understand it is claimed that one shapes the general policies and one operates the fleet. But why have them run from one bureau to another? This amendment provides for one directing head of the entire project, with but one organization. This is strictly in line with an economy bill. It is in accord with the general purposes both of the preceding title and the entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, in the first place, we have delegated to the President under a former title the right to make many changes and consolidations. I think the gentleman from Texas will agree with me that as to any board or bureau or commission which has been set up by an act of Congress the President could only recommend, and could not abolish, and it will have to be abolished by affirmative action of the Congress itself. We have authorized the President already to take such steps as he may deem necessary.

The committee went into the question of the Shipping Board and the Merchant Fleet Corporation. I think the committee has been a little extreme, if we may use that term, when it comes to the Shipping Board. We have cut their number from seven to four, we have authorized and directed practically certain economies in their personnel, and with respect to their pay roll, and I think we have treated this matter as well, and have gone as far, as is practicable at this particular time.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the former authorization, which the gentleman points out, simply authorized the President to make recommendations to the Congress, and they do not become effective at once but are subject to the veto power of the Congress. This amendment gives him absolute authority to do away with or abolish these activities, and with respect to the point of order, I think the gentleman has been discussing the merits rather than the point of order.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman from Texas whether he thinks the Congress can delegate such authority?

Mr. JONES. They can authorize the discontinuance of any agency of the Government. I do not regard this as delegation of legislative authority.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Texas, when Title III was under consideration, offered this same amendment in a different form to Title III. A point of order was made against it at the time by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON], and the Chair overruled the point of order and held that it was germane to Title III. The Chair does not think it is germane as a new title or as a new section, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the second part of the amendment as a new title.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 43, line 2, after the word "effect" insert a new title to be known as Title V (a) as follows:

"The President is authorized to abolish the Federal Trade Commission effective June 30, 1932, and when so abolished its unexpended funds shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this part of the bill. It should have been offered as an amendment to Title III or IV. As the bill is framed, the House considered the subject of the Shipping Board under Title III, and under Title IV we considered certain authority to be vested in the President as to consolidation of governmental bureaus.

It is fundamental parliamentary law that the object of parliamentary law is expedition in the consideration of legislation, and to center the attention of the House or the parliamentary body upon the subject under consideration. If the rule is to be established that we are to be privileged at any time to revert to some subject, we get nowhere, make no progress, and do not save time. I insist on the point it is not germane and that it is too late for the amendment to be offered now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. I want to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that in section 502—

The President is authorized by Executive order to transfer to the Public Works Administration and to consolidate and coordinate therein, the whole or any part of all bureaus, agencies, offices, activities, and services, whether now existing in any executive department, independent establishment, or as an independent activity.

A few days ago, when an amendment was offered to abolish the Farm Board, the ruling was to the effect that when the law was touched in any way an amendment was in order which abolished the activity or which transferred it to another department of the Government.

This is offered as a new title, not merely to a new section but a new title. If it is in order as to almost any part of the bill, it can be offered at the end as a new title, if it is germane to a preceding title.

The CHAIRMAN. Title III provides for certain miscellaneous provisions, and section 502 in Title IV authorizes a consolidation of certain public works. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas now proposes in the form of a new title to abolish the Federal Trade Commission. Certainly the Chair can not hold it germane as a new section. The Chair thinks it would have been germane if offered under the miscellaneous provision in Title III, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to Title III. The Chair understands that the debate had been closed on Title III before I could get recognition. Without an explanation the House would not adopt an amendment. Otherwise I should have offered it at the place suggested by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. STAFFORD objected.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new title:

Page 43, after line 2, insert:

"TITLE 5A. BOARD OF AFFAIRS

"That for the purpose of preventing waste and duplication in making purchases for the United States, there is hereby created a centralized purchasing bureau which shall be known as the board of affairs. Such board shall consist of three members to be selected by the President: Provided, That the President is hereby authorized to fill any vacancy that may occur.

"That such board shall have complete jurisdiction in making purchases for the executive departments of the Government, except articles that would be classed as ordnance affecting the War, Naval, and Coast Guard activities, and supplies for the bureau of public works.

"That each department of the Government shall make inventories every 30 days of all supplies coming under the jurisdiction of the board of affairs, and it shall be the duty of such board to standardize, consolidate, coordinate, and to distribute such supplies so as to prevent duplication in future buying.

"That the board shall prescribe forms, make rules and regulations, and require requisitions to be filled out by the proper officials of each department before making such purchases as may be desired, and when such requisitions are made the same shall state the amount of such article on hand, if any.

"That no purchases amounting to more than $500 shall be made without asking for sealed bids, and the lowest responsible bidder complying with all regulations and specifications shall be giving the award: Provided, That in the case of an emergency the President of the United States may suspend for any given period any or all of the provisions of this act.

"That the President is hereby authorized to transfer from any department of the Government such employees as may be necessary to carry on the business of this bureau, without changing their status with respect to pay.

"That each member of the board shall execute a surety bond in such sum as may be directed by the President, for the purpose of taking care of any irregularity that might occur.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the ground that the proposed amendment is not germane, in that it creates an additional bureau and a charge on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, on page 34, under title of "Public Works," the language provides for the consolidation and coordination of the whole or parts of all bureaus, agencies, offices, activities, and services or bureaus necessary to bring about economy.

This amendment does not provide for the employment of a single additional person, but it does provide for a combined agency of the different bureaus, that they shall be consolidated under one bureau, and that that bureau shall be under the jurisdiction of the President.

This amendment will not cause an increased expense to the Government by a single penny. It will not cause a single bureau employee to be put on the pay roll, and it will prevent 35 independent establishments and 124 bureaus from buying the same articles through independent bureaus. There is no excuse on earth for 124 different bureaus making a requisition to buy articles necessary to carry on the Government. It does seem to me that this House ought to be willing to consolidate wherever it would result in economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is germane, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARLAN. In this title and throughout the bill, there are provisions creating new offices, reducing salaries, and establishing salaries. Will these new provisions for new salaries and reductions, and so forth, be subject to the general provisions that we provided for in Title I, or are they independent of that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry, and frankly, the Chair is unable to inform the gentleman even if it were.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the committee agree to an amendment providing specifically that the Economy Committee on salaries shall apply to the salaries created in this bill?

Mr. McDUFFIE. We will take that matter up after we are through with the bill. We will take it up when we get to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The administration of the Department of National Defense shall be governed by the laws in force with respect to the Department of War and the Department of the Navy at the time of their transfer under this title, in so far as such laws are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title and are not inapplicable.

(c) All orders, rules, regulations, and permits or other privileges made, issued, or granted by or in respect of the Department of War or the Department of the Navy, and in effect at the time of the transfer of such departments under this title, shall continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer had not occurred, until modified, superseded, or repealed.

(d) All unexpended appropriations in respect of the Department of War or the Department of the Navy shall be available for expenditure by the Department of National Defense and shall be treated as if the department had been originally named in the laws making the appropriations.

TIME OF TAKING EFFECT

SEC. 606. This title shall take effect upon the enactment of this act, except that sections 603 to 605, inclusive, shall take effect when the Secretary of National Defense and the assistant secretaries of national defense have taken office.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon Title VI and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, this title, in my judgment—and I am not going to argue it now—is the most important from an economic standpoint in the bill. Not one word of discussion has been had of it. It does seem to me that this House can not afford to put itself in the attitude before the country of undertaking to limit debate upon this title to one hour. I think there should be at least three hours upon this matter. If gentlemen are afraid to have this put before the country, they can object, but I do insist that we ought to proceed in an orderly way and not limit this to an hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that my motion is not debatable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion the gentleman makes is not in order, because there has been no discussion of the title.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest a compromise of two hours.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. One hour is sufficient.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Arizona I ask unanimous consent that we have two hours' debate upon this title. Several gentlemen have made a study of the matter. It is a radical change and I think the House should have some opportunity for discussion. I regret to see the House utilize two hours upon it, but I think it is nothing but fair and I believe we will make time if we agree to two hours. Then at the end of that two hours we will endeavor to cut off debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this title and all amendments thereto close in two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Reserving the right to object, if this request is granted, will the two hours be consumed under the 5-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only way that they could be consumed, and it is within the province of the Chair as to whom he will recognize. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BYRNS. I submit that by unanimous consent we can give a Member additional time if it is wished.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is operating under the rule adopted for the consideration of the bill. The request of the gentleman from Alabama, if granted, would carry two hours' discussion under the 5-minute rule, with recognition by the Chair.

Mr. BYRNS. Do I understand that no Member on the floor of the House will have more than five minutes to discuss an important matter like this?

The CHAIRMAN. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. And if a man has a message, I am sure that the House will give him more time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, then I amend my former request and ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have 30 minutes within which to explain the proposition, as he is the author of this particular provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean 30 minutes within the 2-hour period?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand that the gentleman from Washington objects to the 30-minute proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object to the 30-minute proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will put the original request. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto be closed in two hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Before we proceed with the discussion and amendments to this title, the Chair has examined the title, and he doubts very much if it is divisible or could be affected by amendment. Therefore, he will recognize first the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MARTIN], who will offer an amendment to strike out the title.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I respectfully submit a perfecting amendment would be in order on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not announce that perfecting amendments would not be in order. The Chair simply stated he would recognize the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] to strike out the section.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Two hours have been granted for debate. If during the two hours perfecting amendments are offered, will they be voted on before the two hours are consumed, or may we understand that perfecting amendments will not be voted on until debate has closed?

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the two hours is consumed, then a vote will be taken on all amendments that have been offered to the title. Of course, there will be no further discussion.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon may proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I shall not object if the gentleman from Tennessee, who is one of the fluent advocates of this title, be given 30 minutes in which to present his side of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize only one gentleman at a time.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present, because I did not understand what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Oregon: Beginning on page 43, line 3, strike out all of Title VI.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes, and that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have some authority to speak on the subject of national defense. When the distinguished Senator from my State, the late Hon. George E. Chamberlain, was sponsoring the wonderful national defense act of 1916, the only real constructive military legislation we had had by Congress since 1798, I was in close association with him, more or less. During the administration of that great Secretary of War, the late John Weeks—God bless his memory—I was in the War Department, part of the time as Assistant Chief of Staff, so that I claim a right to be very familiar with this subject.

This section of the bill is presented as a measure of efficiency and economy. I tell you solemnly, from my experience, that it is one of the most deadly blows to efficiency that could be struck at the national defense. [Applause.] As a measure of economy, it is a measure not of economy but of extravagance. I tell you frankly that it is the greatest piece of humbuggery in this bill. [Applause.] If any Member of this House believes that this grave matter has received that attention from the Economy Committee sufficient to merit a vote, then I say to that Member that he either fails to grasp the significance of the national defense and its organization, or he is willing to follow the dictates of expediency.

Early in this session the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations introduced the part of this bill which I have moved to strike out. It was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am a member. It was a queer place to have sent it, but it was sent there.

My distinguished colleague appeared before that committee and made the statement that it would add to the efficiency of the Army and the Navy and would save $100,000,000. Our committee met for three months on that question, and because of the prominence and in view of the statement of the gentleman we gave it most careful consideration. The committee was anxious to be convinced. I think all members of the committee were anxious to be convinced that it would save $100,000,000 and would add to the efficiency of the Army and the Navy, but from the beginning of those hearings to the end there was not a scintilla of evidence that it would save $100,000,000 or that it would add to the efficiency of the Army or the Navy. On the other hand, there came before us men who should know about those things. If we were discussing a merger of this House and the Senate, who would we turn to? We would go to the Vice President and the Speaker of this House and the old Members of long experience. It might be asked why we did not bring some of us youngsters in. We youngsters would not attempt to tell you what would be the effect of a merger. We brought before that committee both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. We brought before that committee the Chief of Naval Operations, the Chief of Staff, the Chiefs of the Air Service and Supply, and we had a most enlightening letter from the Chief of Staff of the Army. What was that testimony? That testimony universally was that this measure would be a fatal blow to the efficiency of the Army and would be extravagance. Still we waited and waited for the protagonists of the $100,000,000 saving and efficiency to appear. We closed those hearings, and we laid this outrageous bill on the table by a vote of 12 to 8, a nonpartisan vote; and if one member of the committee who was absent, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL], had been able to be present, the vote would have been 13 to 8. That shows how the committee was convinced on this question.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. Is it not a fact that there was not any evidence brought before the committee which showed any specific saving?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Not a scintilla, and in my opinion it could not be done.

Four times during the past decade has this matter been the subject of extensive investigations by committees of national importance. Not one has recommended that this Government set up the air services as an independent body coordinate with the Army or the Navy. Only one has recommended that there be created a department of national defense, and that committee's concern was primarily that of the proper organization for our air services. The scope of the past investigations have been broad. To disregard their conclusions is a hasty effort to meet political demands in the face of the probable dire circumstances is beyond my comprehension.

By favoring this bill we are fostering a severe blow to the morale of our national-defense forces. The spirit of the Army and of the Navy, built up to its present high state during the past century and a quarter of our Nation's history, is of utmost value to the Nation. To rip it asunder by creating a chaos in their organization, particularly now when national defense again assumes an intimate aspect on the stage of world affairs, would be a distinct contribution to military impotence. Impair the morale of the Army and the Navy, which is the foundation of their efficiency in the preparation for war and in the conduct of war, and you have done an irreparable damage, one that can not be measured in money or other material things.

The saving of money is secondary in the matter of national defense. Efficiency in war is what we demand of the Army and the Navy. This proper relationship of efficiency and economy was clearly enunciated before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Yet some Members of this House appear to be in a mood to disregard the testimony of witnesses who were in high places in the World War and who to-day hold the most important positions in the Army and the Navy. These witnesses were emphatic in their statements that efficiency of the Army, the Navy, or the air forces would not be served by the propositions of this bill; they are equally as firm in their convictions that the efficiency would suffer.

Economy is secondary. Let us view the proposal from that angle. No line of this bill carries any concrete proposal for economy. It has been claimed that this consolidation will yield an economy of as much as $100,000,000. This was the figure publicly stated by Chairman BYRNS. Why, if such economies are possible, are they not outlined in this measure? The answer is clear—because there is no such economy in sight! If any single item had presented itself to the proponents of this bill which would concretely show a saving, it is unquestionable that they would have inserted it into its framework.

This bill places the entire subject of a possible economy in the hands of the President of the United States. He has clearly stated in his message to Congress that he does not favor such an amalgamation. His Secretary of War reiterated that no economy is possible. His Secretary of the Navy has testified to the same effect. The Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, and other professional men have given their expert opinion to this effect. How absurd, when the entire executive branch of the Government says that no economies are possible, that this bill should place in the hands of the President the carrying out of such economies without enumerating their possibility in detail! This anomaly is answerable by the simple fact that no such economies are possible. This bill will eventually be an extravagance and not an economy.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is a recognized authority upon military organization. Did the hearings disclose any military authority supporting the consolidation?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Not one whom I would consider a military authority; and since the dawn of history you can find no responsible soldier or sailor who would recommend this thing.

The only real authority they ventured to claim was Hunter Liggett. So I telegraphed that great general in San Francisco, as follows:

Are you in favor of a Department of National Defense or have you ever expressed favor of a united Army and Navy under one department?

From General Liggett I received this telegram in reply:

Have never expressed favor of a united Army and Navy under one department. I am not in favor of Department of National Defense, as I do not think it practical or economical.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. The time of the gentleman is drawing to a close. Before he finishes will he tell us whether any economies can be effected by this consolidation? [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I was in hopes I would have time to go thoroughly into that subject to show the House what a farce this whole thing is.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] asked if any military authority appeared before the Expenditures Committee and testified in favor of the consolidation. I will say there were not, but by innuendo the committee hearings show that officers now on the pay rolls in our national-defense organizations indicated in the dark that they were in favor of it. It was anonymous testimony. Those people ought to come out in the open or be removed from the pay roll of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Might not this proposed consolidation develop in time to the point that it might have at its head a superman?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Most dangerous.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A man with too much power.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It would be fatal in war when prompt decisions must be made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It might lead to the very kind of militarism which nearly all citizens are trying to avoid.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. For instance, when I was in the War Department frequently some delicate question would come up, and I can now see Secretary Weeks reaching for that black slouch hat of his, marching across the street to the President, and he would be back in five minutes with a decision.

General MacArthur's letter to the committee, to which I have referred, is as follows:

GENERAL M'ARTHUR OPPOSES AMALGAMATION OF WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

The Chief of Staff, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, has sent the following letter to the Hon. CHARLES H. MARTIN, Representative from Oregon, with reference to the project for amalgamation of the War and Navy Departments into a single bureau of the Government:

"You have asked for an informal expression of my views concerning the project for amalgamating the War and Navy Departments into a single bureau of government.

"No other measure proposed in recent years seems to me to be fraught with such potential possibilities of disaster for the United States as is this one. The proven agencies which have successfully conducted this country through six wars in a period of 125 years are now under the apparent dictation of a measure of economy to be launched on an adventure which, under certain conditions, might involve the very life of the Nation.

"Not only the military history of this country but of every other country gives indisputable proof of the advantages of maintaining in time of war the integral control of the two great branches of national defense—the Army and the Navy. Each must be free to perform its mission unhindered by any centralized and ponderous bureaucratic control. To those who have had practical experience in the conduct of war this principle is so basic and clear that it seems almost impossible that serious thought could be given to any other arrangement.

"I know of no responsible soldier or sailor in the whole gamut of history who has advocated such a plan as is now proposed. From the beginning of armies and navies the whole mass of testimony, not only of the great captains of history but of all those students who have written upon the subject, has been practically unanimous in this matter. When the Congress of the United States, in 1798, for specific and cogent reasons, abandoned the unsuccessful attempt to administer the two great fighting services through a single department, it was but conforming to the lessons of history, to the accumulated experience of civilized peoples, and to the dictates of logic. Fighting on the sea and fighting on the land have no elements in common except in so far as they are both engaged in the ultimate mission of victory. Separate commanders, specialized staffs, particularized training, and individual supply arrangements must remain as essentials for each. I will not attempt to burden you with a repetition of the manifold arguments along this line which have already been advanced. I merely wish to emphasize that I give it as my fixed opinion that such an amalgamation as proposed would endanger victory for the United States in case of war.

"As I understand it, however, the motivation of the proposition is not efficiency but economy. This feature of the subject has been discussed for weeks by your committee, and by other similar groups at various periods during the past decade; yet I challenge anyone to show a single major line of operation along which important economies could be effected without dangerously impairing efficiency. The proponents of economy have been unable to develop a concrete program outlining its factors. The basic hope they have advanced seems to be built upon the thought that the amalgamation will do away with certain overhead expenses. Small and trivial concrete cases have been cited of possible overlapping and from these trivialities an opinion has been expressed that great economies may be accomplished by their elimination. The contrary result would obtain. Formation of the great organization proposed would not materially lessen the necessity for the separate logistical, administrative, and training staffs now existing, but would at once attract to itself a group of officers, civil officials, clerks, and others, which would probably exceed in cost and size during the course of time anything that this Nation has ever experienced. The history of government demonstrates that the parasitical development of bureaucracy spring from the setting up of superfluous échelons of control, such as the one proposed. Although I recognize the possibility of effecting relatively unimportant economies in isolated activities, the ultimate cost of this superimposed structure would, in my opinion, exceed by millions any economies that could be safely effected. The super-Cabinet officer at its head could not fail to be the acquisitor of one of the largest and undoubtedly the most powerful governmental organization the United States has ever known. New buildings, new schools for the training of the composite soldier-sailor, new staffs, all with their additional cost, would be built up at the top of such a groupment. Rather than economy this amalgamation would, in my opinion, represent one of the greatest debauches of extravagance that any nation has ever known.

"The nations of the world have not all been wrong for all time. If it had been advantageous for governments to accomplish such organization as is now suggested, it would have been done decades, or even centuries, ago. The ingenuity of man has never found such outlet in any other channel as in that concerning war. This bill would run counter to the experience of the world.

"I can not emphasize too strongly the inadvisability of the serious consideration of this change in the face of the international situation that now exists. The instability, the uncertainty, the loss of morale among the combatant forces that would be entailed by acrimonious discussions along this line, seem to me to be fraught with such peril to the Government that even if everything that were said in favor of this bill by its proponents were true, I still would give my most solemn counsel to suspend action until the world has reached a condition of approximate normalcy.

"I am not going to burden you with a further detailed discussion, but this note represents the epitome of my professional opinion, in accordance with your verbal request. Pass this bill and every potential enemy of the United States will rejoice."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished retired officer of the Army who has just addressed you calls for some evidence by those who favor this merger. I will say that General Economy favors it. Also the experts on the Appropriations Committee, who have had 20 years or more experience in service on that committee. I cite them as authority for the statement that economies will result because of the merger of these two great services. In addition to that, I cite one other service in Army and Navy, and that is the Air Service. What justification have we for having two or three respective air services, one in the Army, one in the Navy, and one in the Marine Corps?

I served back in 1921 to 1923 as a member of the subcommittee handling War Department appropriations, and there my attention was called to the duplications of activity, particularly in the Air Service. I became convinced that the Government would save millions and millions of dollars if those three air services were directed by one head.

We are appropriating $25,000,000 or more for aircraft construction in the Army, more for the Navy, and a large amount for the Marine Corps. Each service maintains its own technical force of highly paid civilian employees. How can anyone in the face of that condition say that economies will not result by the merger of those services? The Navy maintains a large force of technicians for naval aircraft at South Philadelphia, the Army a still larger force at Dayton, and the Marine Corps its independent unit at Quantico.

I know there is a studied effort on the part of the navy yards and others favorable to the existing system to have no economies whatsoever. They are in favor of the existing order. It can not be expected that the favored personnel, which is nicely intrenched in these three respective services, would come here and advocate giving up their berths.

Those who followed these services during the war know that we suffered by reason of conflicts between the Army and the Navy.

Great Britain has one unified service. Can anyone—even the retired Army officer who has just addressed you—cite any instance where Great Britain suffered in the World War by reason of having one unified service as is proposed here?

Take the subject of hospitalization. We had that subject up the other day. A great saving in hospitalization would result and as many other economies.

Naval hospitals and Army hospitals are independently established, with consideration only as to the need of their respective services. Here, too, the same service could be rendered to both services with saving from duplication.

In our work on the Committee on Military Affairs we find rivalry between the two services. Last year the War Department recommended that the Government abandon and sell a valuable tract of land on the Potomac, near Alexandria, that they no longer needed. I felt it was my duty to write to the Secretary of the Navy that we were about to give up this valuable tract of land and sell it at public auction. I thought that piece of land might be needed by the Navy. I wrote to Secretary Adams and called his attention to it. In reply he stated he would have need for it, but immediately the War Department woke up and found they would have need for it. Everywhere we find this rivalry.

Another instance of duplication: During the war the War Department at great expense established a proving ground of great extent along the Chesapeake Bay to test out our various guns and armament. A range of 30 miles was required. Shortly thereafter the Navy was securing an expensive tract on the Potomac for a similar activity, when that of the Army was entirely available for that purpose—original duplicate investments running into the millions and now expensive costs of maintenance.

The proposal now before us is to have a coordinating head for these two branches. Would not any private interest have a coordinating head for all of its various branches? Take the General Motors Corporation. That corporation not only manufactures automobiles but refrigerators and many other kinds of manufactures; but they have one manufacturing head, Mr. Sloan.

If you are in favor of economic management as in private industry, where one coordinating head controls, you will favor this proposal, and it will do away with bureaucracy in the Army, in the Navy, and the Marine Corps. You will have one head who will strike out all false extravagances and save the Government, the Air Service alone, millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DE PRIEST. The gentleman has indulged in general statements on economy. I would like to ask him to cite one instance in figures where economy will result from the adoption of this proposal.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Air Service alone will save $25,000,000. When I served on that committee 10 years ago I was convinced it would save $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 if those two services were combined. But the figures now suggested are $25,000,000. As I have said, the respective Air Services have their own technical men, engaged in the same study and employed with the same problems. You take dirigibles. The Army has one sort of dirigible and the Navy has another sort of dirigible. Why, the barest consideration of the similarity of the two services in so many fields will suggest economies by merger of like activities running into the millions. Those who favor economy should certainly approve this proposal.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] for five minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, under the name of economy this proposal to consolidate the Army and Navy into a single department of national defense, with subsecretaries for Army, Navy, and aviation, has been brought before the House. If the committee had deliberately tried to devise a scheme that would decrease the efficiency of the Army and Navy and cause increases in the cost of national defense, they could scarcely have devised a better scheme.

Bills of a similar nature were considered by the Committee on Expenditures in the Federal Government. That committee held long hearings and had before it, among others, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, and the Chief of the Army Air Service. Both Secretaries opposed the measure, as did the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff and the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics in the Navy. That committee, after protracted discussions, finally tabled the measure by a vote of 11 to 8. After mature consideration they had seen the unwisdom and gross extravagance which was involved in the plan.

The measure was then taken up by the Economy Committee of this body. While I do not wish to reflect upon the intelligence of the distinguished members of that committee, it is apparent they know little or nothing of the organization and operation of the Navy and the Army. Otherwise they could not have included in this omnibus bill a proposal so fatal to the efficiency of the national defense as the one under discussion. Apparently they have been influenced largely by the fact that in a few minor instances similar activities are operated by both the Army and Navy in the same locality, completely overlooking the fact that Navy activities are primarily designed and operated for the support of the fleet, whereas Army activities are designed and maintained for the support of land forces.

To believe that economy would be promoted is to indulge in an evanescent dream. In place of economy, the formation of a department of national defense and the establishment under that department of a separate aviation subdepartment would result in huge additional expenditures. In the first place, the secretary of national defense would have to have as his advisers a staff composed of Navy, Army, and air officers, and that staff would require clerical and other help. In addition, the air force would have to establish a headquarters of its own. In Great Britain, where a separate air force has been established, such headquarters cost 3.11 per cent of the total expenditures on the air service. Such headquarters was relatively much more expensive than the admiralty headquarters or the war office headquarters.

If adjacent air fields are to be consolidated into a single field and the hangars and machine shops consolidated, it will mean that buildings now occupied by the Navy must be moved away from their most convenient location on the water front, or that Army facilities must be moved to the water front. The equipment of the Navy fields is no greater than is needed for Navy needs, and the equipment of the Army fields is no greater than required for Army needs. For the sake of the theory, they may be consolidated and made inconvenient for either or both services; but it will not promote economy, it will not promote efficiency, and will involve increased costs. A separate air force will inevitably require the establishment of an air academy similar to West Point and Annapolis. This requires money. It is not an economy.

A separate air recruiting service will be required, and training stations for the air force enlisted personnel will inevitably follow. If we can judge anything from the experience of foreign countries, an additional medical corps for the air service will inevitably follow, a supply corps for the air service will follow, and a construction corps for the air service will follow, and sooner or later all the staff corps will be reestablished in the air force. These things inevitably cost money. There is no economy in it.

It has generally been recognized that aviation is a young man's game. After an officer reaches the age of 45, he has not the fire and dash that is requisite for the most efficient combat flying. As a result, the great numbers of young officers must either be retired at a relatively low age or promoted and assigned to duties which are more or less nominal in character. Either procedure involves a huge economic waste. In the Navy, aviators after they have been employed during their younger years, are assigned duties on board ship, but their services may be profitably used by the Government until they reach the retiring age. This is the most economical use of their services, and the present system has resulted in the attainment of an aviation service second to none in the world. From the standpoint of economy, the proposal for a department of national defense is grotesque, and did it not involve the expenditure of millions of dollars, which must be raised by hard-earned taxes, it might be regarded as farcical.

Let us now look at the question from the viewpoint of efficiency. Military forces are maintained in order to render the most efficient service possible to the country in the event of war. Any action which tends to decrease that efficiency is in itself the greatest form of extravagance. It is vitally necessary that an admiral commanding the naval forces of this country at sea should have the control and direction of all forces in order to coordinate their efforts and bring about the defeat of the enemy. He must be able to give directions not only to the battleships, the cruisers, the destroyers, and the submarines, but he must also control the air forces, in order that they may work in conjunction with the surface and the subsurface craft to defeat the enemy. It is not enough that he should have a nominal control or that he should rely upon cooperation. He must have the absolute military control over the aviation units. He must be in a position, not to request them to do something, but to order them to do something. That is the only way in which victory at sea can be achieved. If you, gentlemen, wish to destroy the efficiency of your Navy, if you wish to insure the defeat of this country upon the sea in the event of war, then you should support this bill; but if you wish your Navy to be strong, if you wish it to bring victory to your country, then you should oppose this department of national defense.

The condition in the land forces is little different from that in your Navy. The general commanding an army must have control, not only over the infantry and the cavalry and the artillery, but he must have control over the air forces. That control must be as absolute and as certain as that which an admiral should have over the forces under his command at sea. It is essential that he must not only direct the efforts of those branches, but he must have absolute control over them.

Time is a matter of vital importance in naval and land warfare. The artillery effort must be accurately timed to support the infantry in its advance, and the support which aviation can give will be valuable if it is timed and almost useless if it is not timed so as to fit in with the effort of the other branches. To divorce aviation from the Army or Navy is to strike a vital blow at the efficiency of those services and to go far toward destroying the efficiency of both the Army and the Navy.

The proposal contained in this bill has been considered by neither the Military Affairs Committee of this House nor by the Naval Affairs Committee, but by the Committee on Economy, whose members know little of the Army or Navy. Some years ago a similar proposal was considered by the Military Affairs Committee of the House and definitely rejected. This very proposition was considered by the Committee on Expenditures and rejected. A separate air department was considered at great length by the Morrow Board and definitely rejected.

The present system has brought about the most efficient naval aviation in the world. This is generally conceded even by foreign observers. On this subject Admiral Beatty had the following to say:

The Royal Navy to-day is the most up-to-date and efficient navy in the world, except in one respect, and that is its air equipment. The air wing of the United States Navy, owing to the single control exercised over the United States Navy, is far ahead of our fleet air arm. They carry out exercises on a scale quite impossible in our fleet. I view with dismay the grim prospect of superimposing expenditure for the air service on the already heavy expenditure of the army and navy. We are the highest-taxed country in the world and yet we commit ourselves to the extravagance of having three fighting services. Reduce them to two and we should save millions of public money with greater efficiency, as in the United States.

If you gentlemen wish to destroy the efficiency of your Army and the efficiency of your Navy, then you should vote for this section; but if you desire to maintain the efficiency of those services, in my opinion, you should unhestitatingly vote to strike this pernicious section from this bill, and you should remember that there is scarcely a representative of the Army or Navy who has been heard on the matter who does not unqualifiedly recommend against this pernicious proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, if there was ever a time on earth when efficiency should be the thought uppermost in the minds of legislators, it is now. The condition of the people everywhere is far worse than at any time during my recollection. In all the mail that you and I are receiving the people are wondering why we do not do something to reduce the expenses of this Government.

We appointed an Economy Committee that has worked long hours for the purpose of bringing to the House a program which would enable us to save some money, but every time any proposition comes before this body to save money then the class that is affected immediately refuse to contribute in any way in bringing about the desired result.

I am a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, and I want to tell you something about the activities of that department of Government. We have in the Navy and in the Army about 21,000 officers, and the appropriation necessary to take care of these 21,000 officers is approximately $100,000,000 per year. In the Navy there are about 8,000 or 9,000 officers, and we have only about 80,000 enlisted men for them to look after; in other words, it requires 1 officer to look after every 10 enlisted men. The proportion is wrong, and I want to say to you that as long as we have our Army and Navy scattered all over this Nation and all over our different insular possessions, divided up as they are, we are going to continue to have the same kind of jealousy and animosity that is apparent now.

A short time ago it was my privilege to go down to Australia and New Zealand, and while there, in a conversation with the Minister of Defense, who is the head of the combined army, navy, and air service, I asked him the question whether he had any jealousy or animosity on the part of the different services, and he replied, "Certainly not; why should I? I am the boss."

During the World War our allies found it was not possible to maintain the right kind of efficiency over in Europe until we selected some one officer and placed him at the head of all the different kinds of activities. The same thing that was true then is true now, and just as long as you have this divided authority just so long will you have jealousy and animosity; and when you have jealousy and animosity in any bureau that has for its purpose the serving of a common interest, just that long will you have inefficiency.

I want to call your attention to the enormous increase in appropriations that are being made for the Navy on a peace basis.

During the year 1914, prior to the World War, our total appropriation for naval activities was $148,254,322.41. In 1915 it was $151,033,908.03. At that time we had approximately 55,000 enlisted men. This year the appropriation has been increased until the amount is practically doubled, it being more than $320,000,000. The number of enlisted men has increased only approximately 50 per cent, while the amount of money we are expending represents an increase of more than 100 per cent. This same situation is true with respect to the Army.

Prior to the World War the activities of the Navy could be housed in a portion of one of our public buildings. At present it requires at least fifty times more space for such purposes, and instead of being on a peace basis the activities have increased until between 500 and 1,000 different articles are being manufactured in competition with private industry. These plants are located at a number of cities throughout the Nation; and if this consolidation were brought about, an enormous amount of expense could be saved in this activity alone.

The Secretary of the Navy on February 24 furnished to me a statement that showed some of the articles that were being manufactured by the Navy, which is as follows:

FEBRUARY 24, 1932.

Special manufacturing facilities exist at the industrial navy yards as follows:

Portsmouth, N. H.: Electrical fittings and fixtures; submarine propellers; aluminum castings.

Boston, Mass.: Rope (Manila and hemp); chain cable (forged steel); kenter shackles; chain-cable tests.

New York, N. Y.: Diesel engines and parts; flags and hammocks; valves, H. P. and L. P., and parts; pipe flanges; mattresses, hammock; centrifugal castings; laboratory tests of material and equipment.

Philadelphia, Pa.: Steel castings; atomizers; registers and parts for oil-burning burners; mattresses; ship propellers; the naval aircraft factory is located in this yard.

Washington, D. C.: Guns, mounts, and turrets; ship models and model tests; propeller models and tests; catapults; bomb racks; radio equipment; optical instruments; steel castings; model basin and wind tunnel are located at this yard.

Norfolk, Va.: Motor-boat engines and parts; paints, cements, varnish, shellac, wax, and putty; metal furniture; cans and receptacles; kenter shackles; cast-steel chain cable; gyro-compass parts; turbine blading; steel and aluminum castings; boilers for naval vessels; reconditioning of gas cylinders.

Mare Island, Calif.: Motor-boat engine parts; paints, cements, varnish, shellac, putty, and wax; clothes lockers; centrifugal castings; flags; rubber products; chain-cable tests; reconditioning of gas cylinders; mattresses; paint buckets and receptables; propellers, ship and motor boat; coils, evaporator.

Puget Sound, Wash.: Canvas work, hammocks; chain cable; valves and flanges; steel castings; chain-cable tests.

Cavite, P. I.: Flags and canvas work; rope; mattresses; paints.

It is reasonable to suppose that the Army has just as many manufacturing industries, and I venture to assert that there is no cooperation between these departments in furnishing such articles as are manufactured by one branch of our national defense to the other. It will be said that some of the articles manufactured could not be used by the Army; yet, the fact remains that the labor and machinery could be used to manufacture a large number of the articles adaptable to both the Army and the Navy, thus enabling millions of dollars to be saved, if it is necessary to continue this policy.

The Navy maintains two different kinds of recruiting stations, and the Army one. Oftentimes all three of these are located in the same city. At present some of these stations are not enlisting over three individuals per month, and each one of them maintains a separate bureau and, as a rule, maintains a commissioned officer in charge of the activity. Enormous sums of money are wasted by this kind of duplication. There is no coordination to speak of with respect to the purchasing of supplies. At the end of the World War the Army had on hand 10,000 Liberty motors and the Navy had over 7,000. Many millions of dollars were wasted because neither activity had information concerning what was being bought by the other department. This same thing is true with hundreds of other articles that could be enumerated, and in my opinion there never will be proper efficiency until our national defense is divided into three heads—the Army, the Navy, and a unified air service—and all placed under one department to be known as the Department of National Defense. The nations of the world that are the best off financially and the ones that have the greatest sea powers have recognized the necessity of having their national defense under one head. No one can say that France and England do not have a proper knowledge with respect to war activities, as their very existence depends on having the most efficient method of handling their national defense. At present both the Navy and the Army have the United States and our insular possessions divided into corps areas. There is extreme jealousy between these two different services as to the line of demarcation separating the jurisdiction between land and sea. Evidence has been given in hearings held before House committees which showed the jealousy existing between the Army and the Navy activities, among those stationed in our insular possessions, and so long as the Army and Navy have equal jurisdiction this condition can not be remedied.

This world is suffering because of abnormal and excessive military expenditures. In this Nation it is estimated that more than 75 cents out of every dollar is expended for national defense, pensions, hospitals, and other expenditures incident to the results of war. The Government at the present time has over a million employees, which brings about an annual expenditure of over $1,000,000,000. The time has come when our citizens will not very much longer put up with the policy now in effect, which is causing the expenses of the Government to go forward in leaps and bounds. Therefore, it would seem to me that any Member of Congress could see the wisdom of creating these three separate bureaus and placing them under one head, so that duplication, jealousy, and inefficiency could be put to an end and at the same time bring about an enormous reduction of costs amounting to many millions of dollars annually.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, no one knows better than I do the demand throughout the country for retrenchment and reduction of expenditures by the Congress. It has been heralded that this entire proposal of the House Economy Committee will save the taxpayers $200,000,000 without impairing the efficiency of the Government. Even if that be so, the saving will be far below the expectations of the people. Large reductions can be made only by the actual elimination of activities and services which are not absolutely essential for the proper and necessary functions of the Federal Government. On March 15 last, I made a speech in the House, in which I called attention to the fact that for the current fiscal year, 1932, Congress appropriated for direct payments to the States, for subsidies pure and simple, for purposes not Federal or National, but State and local in character, the total sum of $249,246,144.76, and for cooperative work with the States, for similar purposes, the further sum of $15,380,040. These and similar expenditures should have received attention and action at the hands of our Committee on Economy.

However, I for one shall support the proposals which this committee has made. We have so far in Committee of the Whole largely emasculated the work of the Economy Committee. When the time comes for separate votes on the propositions which have been before us, we will have an opportunity to redeem the reputation and standing of the House before the country on these questions. [Applause.]

I have taken the floor to say I shall support every proposition for real economy, but I can not believe that there is any meritorious economy in the proposal to consolidate the War and Navy Departments.

The report of the committee shows no real saving in this proposal, and in the very nature of things the mere consolidation will not reduce expenses materially. Besides, I would do nothing that impairs any or all branches of our national defense. I can not take my authority for legislation upon national defense from those who have not given their lives to the work and study of national defense. I propose rather to take it from men in our Government and among our people who have given the subject their thorough and sympathetic consideration. Such men are universally opposed to this consolidation, and believe it will work injury to the efficiency and morale of our Military and Naval Establishments.

Of course, as the committee report states, there will be saving of one member of the President's Cabinet, by substituting one Secretary of National Defense, but there will be added, instead, three Assistant Secretaries, one for War, one for Navy, and one for Aeronautics. The report of the committee goes on to say that "it makes no changes with reference to the Army and Navy, but does provide that the Secretary of National Defense may consolidate" the various air forces. The resulting economy is altogether problematical; in fact, the report says that "it is impossible to state just what amount will be saved as a result of this consolidation," but upon an undisclosed basis the report adds that it is "estimated" that from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 "may" be saved. Equally reliable estimates show no real saving, but even probable increase of expenditures with a larger unit of diversified activities. In all events, there are many things we can do as a matter of economy rather than emasculate and destroy the national defense in this hour, when the conditions of the world certainly do not encourage such a procedure.

The national defense is, in my opinion, the most important activity of the Federal Government. The Constitution makes national defense one of the main purposes of its existence, and it is one of the last things we should in any way throw into jeopardy. At least we should be certain of the effect of any action we may take regarding it.

I repeat I am for economy. I shall support the work of the Economy Committee, but this particular question must be subjected to expert knowledge; this is a matter that involves the existence and the perpetuity of the Republic; and I can not make myself believe that I should set up my judgment against the universal opinion of those who have devoted their lives to the matter of national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Stop and consider what is the objective of the Army and the Navy. It is the same—national defense. If we had any other two branches of the Government that had the same objective, we would say, put them together and place them under one head.

In five minutes one can not say much concerning this proposition, to create a Department of National Defense. The Committee on Expenditures held hearings for several weeks upon this bill that you are now going to be asked to vote on.

Mention has been made of the Air Corps. The gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, would like to know who says that we should have a united Air Corps. In answer to him I say that the present Chief of the Air Corps of the Army stated that eventually we would have to have one Air Corps. Further, General Patrick, former Chief of the Air Corps, wrote a book, which can be obtained in the Library, and in conclusion he recommends a united Air Corps. Let me show you the disposition of the Army toward the Navy. Small matters, but they make my point.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I regret I can not yield. I do not have the time. For three years there has been a dispute between the Army and the Navy Air Corps over an air field in Hawaii. Gentlemen say that the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and that he can settle arguments. Why has it not been settled before this? The matter is still in dispute. The Navy wants that air field and the Army refuses to give it to the Navy. If you had one head for the Army and Navy, that dispute would have been settled.

The former chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. JAMES] told me of another matter which gentlemen will probably say is trivial, but, small as it is, it will give an idea of how they are working together.

He told me that on one of his inspection trips, which resulted in his coming back to the House and giving us wonderful information relative to the activities of the Army, and I will say I think he knows as much about the Army as any man, he was flying into a field in California, the Navy having one side and the Army having the other side. He told his pilot to fly in a certain direction. The pilot informed him that he could not fly in that direction, because he would be required to go over the Navy side of the field, and the Navy would not let Army planes fly over the Navy side of the field. Mr. JAMES told him that he was the commander of the ship, and instructed the pilot to enter that field over the Navy side. By the time his machine landed on the field a bunch of Navy officers were running across the field to chastise the pilot for flying over their side of the field. Some one ran out and told these officers who was in the ship, and they immediately turned around and went back.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am sorry I can not yield. We had a discussion yesterday about transports. Does anyone know of any reason in the world why the Navy transports should not carry the Army men? If anyone does, let him give it.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Please answer in your own time; I have but five minutes. Let the enlisted men in the Navy man the transports that carry the personnel of the Army to different sections of the world. Will that save money? Of course it will.

Mr. HORR. Is the gentleman sincere in wanting an answer to his question?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Certainly, but I do not have the time to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Gentlemen, you can start at the bottom, and that is the recruiting stations. Any one of you gentlemen who comes from a city where they have a recruiting station will know that there are three recruiting stations—the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps—each with a separate assignment of officers, doctors, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men on duty. Why could you not get along with one recruiting station for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps? Small, but it shows how money can be saved.

You will hear much to-day about the Army and the Navy getting together, that they are on good terms. They get together once a year, and that is when the President invites them to the White House to the Army and Navy reception, and that is the only time they ever get together. They will not get together, and this extends from the enlisted man to the door of the Cabinet officers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I just listened to my friend speak about the Hawaiian situation. I was over there myself and made a study of it. What the gentleman said is absolutely without any foundation. There is no fuss between the Army and the Navy over there in respect to where they shall land. The only difficulty is that the field is a little too small. The time is near when they will have to make a new field on the other side, so that the Army will be able to land there. The statement that there is a dispute between them is without foundation.

I have been making a little study of this in a business way. I am not particularly anxious to put my opinion above that of anyone else, but you are now getting into a situation where you are either going to make money for the Government or lose it, and my judgment is that you will lose it twice as fast the way you are trying to arrange it now.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Talking about this dispute between the Army and the Navy, I suppose the gentleman is familiar with the joint board, organized in 1903?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Does the gentleman know how many disputes there have been before that board in the last 30 years? Five hundred and four, and all of them have been settled.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Everyone knows that who has made any study of the matter. They make these settlements, and I know there is nothing in this story about the fuss between the Army and the Navy.

By the formation of a Department of National Defense a serious blow would be struck at the efficiency of our national-defense forces in time of war. We maintain the Army and the Navy solely for the emergency of war; if we can not be assured that they will be efficient to maintain the security of our country in war we might as well dispense with them entirely.

To those who have made a life study of military and naval affairs we should turn when we want advice for the defense of a nation. The officers of the Army and the Navy are charged with grave responsibilities of maintaining the efficiency of the defense forces. During the World War it will be noticeable that governments were reorganized to cope with the demands of that war and still not a single power turned to a consolidation of the Army and Navy to bring about efficiency in any nation's fighting power.

The confusion of such legislation would create a disastrous effect. Remember, the President is the Commander in Chief of the two great departments and they are both under his direct control. In war he directs each in conformity with the national policies, each—the Army and Navy—in its distinctive strategical rôles.

What good would a Secretary of National Defense be? He could not decide the great questions of coordination between the Army and Navy. The President could not possibly delegate to him the power of decision with respect to the Army and Navy. If he should do that, he would renounce his responsibilities of the Commander in Chief. Direct action is essential in time of war. That is a fundamental of military organization. The new structure loses advantage of direct action. The secretary of national defense will only hinder and delay action when it is vital.

This bill, as you will notice, proposes a separate department for aviation. Would not common sense teach the Congress of the United States that the Navy needs its own particular kind of aviation and the Army needs theirs. In fact, why should not the Navy control their aviation and the Army control theirs? That is good common sense. If we should set up a Secretary of Aviation in the Department of National Defense, we would only be adding another bureau to the United States Government, and in my judgment you would have to go to the Army and Navy Building and build two more stories on top of it to take care of the bureaus that would occur under this consolidation. The aviation would need at least one floor and there would be more stenographers and clerks employed than there would be sailors.

You must realize that you will not take away any of the members of the War Department. They will all have to remain in their offices. So, naturally, those offices are to be filled by the personnel of the Army.

Then you would have to have another floor built for the benefit of the Secretary of National Defense and he would again be surrounded by clerks and stenographers instead of soldiers.

So, taking it all together, I think that it would be a very serious mistake for the Congress of the United States to make a consolidation of the Army and Navy, and this title should be stricken. There could not possibly be any economy in consolidation; it would be a dissipation of public funds and the efficiency of our national defense forces, would jeopardize our national security, and therefore I believe that the Congress of the United States in their vote to-day should disqualify a consolidation. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard for the officers of the Army and of the Navy, and I am always glad to have their opinions on any matter pertaining to national defense, but I would no more accept their opinions as final in a matter such as the one now before us than I would permit them to write their own pay bill. [Applause.] For eight years I have had the honor to serve on the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, and I have seen so much evidence of overlapping, of duplication, of friction between the two services, costing the taxpayers of the country millions of dollars, that I am convinced that a single Department of National Defense would be a great economy move.

I am supporting this Department of National Defense not only because of economy but because I believe it would make for more efficiency and a more effective national defense.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not now. I only have five minutes. I do not want to be discourteous.

Let me say that during the Sixty-ninth Congress, after weeks of hearings and of study on the question, every Democrat on the Committee on Military Affairs voted for a single Department of National Defense. We must remember that our responsibility is to provide for the national defense, and the Army and the Navy and the Air Corps are merely instrumentalities with which we provide national defense. To-day there is a serious lack of correlation between the missions and the rôles of these different services. All kinds of overlapping and duplication, all kinds of animosities and petty jealousies are present between them.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I can not yield at this time.

The animosity and jealousy and feeling between those two services is such that they can not even get together and play a game of football. [Applause.] What is the practical proposition to-day? The Navy comes to Congress, appearing before its Naval Committee, and there presents its side as to what it wants and what it says it must have, an entirely ex parte proceeding; the Army does the same thing before the Military Committee, and as a consequence the Congress never has a full picture. It just gets one side of the proposition in ex parte proceedings.

The idea of a single Department of National Defense is no departure from the fundamentals of the defense policy of our Government. In the very beginning the thought was that we would have our Army and our Navy, and that the President of the United States would be the Commander in Chief. Our Government, however, has grown and expanded so much, and there are so many duties imposed upon the President, that he simply has no time for bringing about an equilibrium between the services. Furthermore, as has been well said, the advent of the airplane revolutionized the science of warfare more than did the invention of gunpowder. To-day we not only have the Army for land warfare and the Navy for sea warfare but we have the air forces which operate either over the land or sea. Only through a single Department of National Defense can the air forces with economy take their proper place in the scheme of national defense, and the nation that controls the air will win the next war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Title VI, in my judgment, has no place in this bill. [Applause.] The Army and Navy are for common defense. The Union was established to promote the national defense. The title provides for consolidating the Army and the Navy. It also provides for an independent air force.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am a member, has carefully considered during the present session of Congress two bills to consolidate the Army and the Navy. One was introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the other by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON]. Both of these gentlemen are members of the Economy Committee, which reported the bill under consideration for a Department of National Defense.

The Byrns bill is embraced in the pending economy act, but it is just as deficient as the Williamson bill. Both were rejected after hearings by the Committee on Expenditures.

The program for economy should provide economies in departments that already exist. It is hazardous to create new ones. Matters of major importance should have the careful consideration of Congress as independent propositions. [Applause.]

The Army and Navy are the most important departments of the Government. A bill for their consolidation, particularly where it has been rejected by the proper committee of Congress, should not be embraced in the economy program.

CONSOLIDATION

The so-called national-defense title combines the Army and Navy with one Secretary as a member of the Cabinet, and provides for three Assistant Secretaries for the War, Navy, and Air Forces, respectively. Two departments are combined and one new department is created. The bill makes no provision for the lopping off of duplications or for reduction of expenditures in either department. It merely provides, I repeat, for combining the existing departments of the Army and Navy.

In behalf of consolidation it is urged that economy and savings will result. It is asserted that with one executive head there would be greater efficiency in the Army and Navy. As a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I am familiar with the hearings. Three advocates of consolidation appeared before that committee, Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee, Mr. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, of South Dakota. All other witnesses, including the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, opposed the consolidation.

I take it that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] submitted the very best arguments at his command for the consolidation. His statement disclosed that he was unable to show any definite economies that would result from the consolidation. I quote from the hearings and from his statement on page 5 of the hearings. In response to a question by a member of the committee, among other things, the gentleman from Tennessee said:

> You can not tell what savings you can make until this goes into operation.

The Army and Navy ought not to be consolidated on uncertainties. There should be something besides guesses. There should be some basis besides opinion. The only real suggestions for economies made by the gentleman from Tennessee related to the civilian personnel, the contingent expenses and the expenditures for printing and binding for the Army and Navy in the city of Washington. I may also add that the only argument for a separate and unified air force was an alleged reduction in the civilian personnel. The gentleman from Tennessee referred to the naval air station and the Army air station at Bolling Field. He insisted that there should be a reduction in the civilian personnel at this field. He pointed out that the combined cost of the civilian personnel, the contingent expenses, and the expenses for printing and binding in the city of Washington for the Army and Navy aggregated $10,700,000.

The annual appropriation for the maintenance of the Army and the Navy is between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000. The cost of the civilian personnel is comparatively small, but this fact should not deter the reduction of the civilian personnel where it is justified. I advocate economy in both the Army and the Navy.

The gentleman from Tennessee also stated that there were certain overlappings and duplications. If such be the case, they should be eliminated. The remedy is to eliminate and lop off the duplications rather than destroy the efficiency of the two great departments by combining them. It was suggested that there are duplications in matters of communication. The Army and the Navy have their radio ground service. Both have cablegram service. I am not familiar with war, but my reading of military history confirms me in the view that communications are important in warfare. The lack of communication at the first battle of the Marne resulted in the defeat of the German Army. Communications may be costly, but they are important in war.

There was nothing submitted to show that greater efficiency would result by combination. It was suggested that there should be one secretary for the Army and the Navy. At present, however, the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. He is the final executive. The Army and the Navy are immense departments. There are Army posts and stations along the coast and in the great interior of this mighty country of ours. The Navy confines its operations to the sea. Its bases are along the coast. The Army and the Navy are too large for consolidation.

The so-called savings and economies are more fanciful than real. The combining of the two departments would result in the establishment of a superdepartment, with a new staff and with new personnel. The creation of a new department generally results in extravagance. No facts have been advanced to show that any real economies would result, nor have any facts been shown to prove that greater efficiency would obtain by combining the two departments.

JEALOUSIES

It has been said that there is some friction and some jealousy between the two departments. I see no reason to combine them if such exist. The Army has its traditions, and the Navy is entitled to its views. They both function for the national defense. There may be differences between the two, but both the Army and the Navy are patriotic. Their loyalty and their devotion have never been questioned.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] stated that their jealousies prevent the annual football game that formerly obtained. I happen to be a member of a large family. I have several brothers. As boys, we had our differences. They frequently resulted in combats, but it was another question when an outsider engaged my brother in combat. We may have differed among ourselves. There may have been jealousies, but as against all others, we were united. So it is with the Army and the Navy. They may have their differences, they may have their jealousies, but they have been and always will be united for the defense of our common country.

OPPOSITION

I have referred to some of the arguments in favor of combining the Army and the Navy. It has been said that some of the leaders on the Democratic side favor the consolidation. As I have stated, I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Notwithstanding the views of others or of the leaders, I construe it to be my duty as a Member of Congress to consider carefully all propositions submitted to the committees of which I am a member, and to be able to justify by the facts of the hearings any conclusion that I reach. My colleagues would have little respect for my conclusions, if I were unable to justify my course by the facts developed at the hearings.

The proposed consolidation runs counter to human experience. [Applause.] In all ages, among all nations, there have been soldiers and sailors. The soldier functions on the land and the sailor on the sea. Such consolidation not only runs counter to the experiences of all nations, but particularly to the experiences of the United States. When the Union was formed, there was a single department of national defense. There was no separate Navy Department. After George Washington retired from the Presidency to Mount Vernon, it was thought that there would be trouble with France. It was immediately recognized that a consolidated department could not properly function. As a matter of necessity, at the first appearance of war after the Union was formed, the Navy was organized in 1798. The United States has tried the experiment. It has failed. It can not be that the world has been wrong all the time. What soldier or what sailor, what man of experience in war, has advocated the combining of the two departments?

In this connection, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy have separate war and navy departments. We have no use for these departments, except for war and for national defense; but if we are to have them, they should be properly maintained and the departments should properly function. We should profit by our experience and by the experience of human history before we cripple our national defense. Armies and navies have always been independent. The one fights on the land, the other fights on the sea.

There has been vast improvement in both the Army and Navy Departments in the past 30 years. Mention has been made of the purchasing and storekeeping activities. Reasonable coordination and cooperation now obtain with respect to both of these matters. There is the War College in the War Department and the Naval College in the Navy Department. There has been organization and correlation of the activities in the two departments. It was while Elihu Root was Secretary of War that there was a complete reorganization of the War Department, in the interest of both economy and efficiency. We should stop and think before we depart from the course that has made our Nation great as well as the course adopted by the leading nations of the world.

SEPARATE AIR SERVICE

The bill not only provides for combining the Army and the Navy but it provides for a separate air service. This is no new question. It has been thoroughly investigated by committees of Congress. The Lampert Committee made an investigation in 1922 or 1923. Neither Congress nor the country was satisfied with the report of this committee. As a result, the President appointed the Morrow board in 1925. This board was composed of some of the leading business executives of the country and some of the most capable officers of the Army and the Navy. Its unanimous report was against the consolidation of the Army and Navy and against the establishment of an independent air force.

Aviation is expensive. If we are after economy, and if false economy is to obtain, we could eliminate not only much of the Air Service but much of the Army and the Navy. Such economy, however, would be worse than false. The Air Service is important. It is an adjunct of the Army and it is also an adjunct of the Navy. It is valuable. It will play an important part in future warfare. Our experience demonstrates, however, that the air forces should be subject to the Army and subject to the Navy. Greater efficiency obtains by the air forces being subject to the Army and the Navy, rather than being independent.

It is said that there is a separate and unified air force in Great Britain and France. The condition in those nations, however, is different. There are geographical differences. The capitals are no farther apart than the capitals of the States of the Union. They are likewise located not very far from the sea. The situation is different with the United States. We are isolated. The same situation obtains with respect to Japan. It is regarded as one of the major powers. Both the United States and Japan have air forces as adjuncts to the Army and the Navy, rather than as independent departments.

It occurs to me that much confusion would result if the air forces were unified. We have in the Navy the aircraft service. If the aircraft service were under the control of a separate department, it strikes me that there would be much confusion. How could the Lexington, the Saratoga, and the Langley be handled? These are the principal aircraft carriers. They are valuable adjuncts of the Navy, but if the carriers were under different departments, inefficiency would surely follow.

Not only has Congress given consideration to the consolidation of the Army and the Navy, but other nations have given consideration to the matter. In 1922 Great Britain appointed a technical committee to investigate proposals for the consolidation of the Army and Navy. After careful consideration this committee reported that a consolidation was not advisable. Moreover, it stated that it was very doubtful if any substantial economies would be effected.

The investigations heretofore made by the committees of Congress, as well by other committees to which I have referred, have demonstrated that by consolidation a superdepartment would result in increasing the number of officers employed in administrative duties, and would not result in any economy. There is now cooperation, not only in the purchasing and storekeeping activities of the Army and Navy, but there is cooperation in the Army and Navy in what are called joint planning boards, in the aeronautical board, and in the Army and Navy munitions board.

DANGEROUS

It is no time for change. Mere change is not progress. The universal experience is that the establishment of a new department results in extravagance. Our dual system has been perfected through the years. Why should the United States embark upon the hazardous and dangerous policy of combining the Army and Navy? Why not advocate combining the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior?

We have one Executive. He is supreme in war and peace. The President of the United States is Commander in Chief of both the Army and the Navy.

Separate departments promote progress. The Army and Navy try to excel each other. A consolidated department would call for new schools. Neither Annapolis nor West Point would be in order. New institutions for training the soldier-sailor would be required. The consolidation would really be foreign to economy.

The two departments have existed and functioned well for 125 years. Neither is perfect, but we have fought six wars successfully. In this period of unrest at home and abroad there is no time for experiment. Preparedness is the goal. Separate departments have been justified by our experience in every war we have ever fought.

The World War is still fresh in our minds and the achievements of the Army and the Navy are vivid in our memories. It was the greatest war in which the American soldier and sailor ever participated. We had better play safe. For any imperfections, for any duplications, for any excess of personnel the remedy is for the legislative committees to modify existing law. The remedy is for the Appropriations Committee to prevent waste and extravagance. Mere consolidation is not economy. It may hinder rather than promote the national defense.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, during the World War the allied armies, including the American Army, were trying their best to bring victory to the allied forces. They had a great deal of difficulty until finally at the suggestion of the different generals and the prime ministers and the President of the United States, they agreed on a unified control, putting all of the armies of the Allies under the control of General Foch. A short time after that was done, the war was prosecuted to a successful conclusion on the part of the Allies.

While they were waiting for this unified control, you had the picture of many men at Cambrai in the English Army and in the French Army going to their deaths as a result of no reserves being brought up from other armies to reinforce the army attacked. The British general would ask for reserves from the French when attacked and would not get them, but would be told: "We have got to keep our reserves down here at this point of the line and we can not give them to you." You have all read that history; you know that is so. Finally unified control was secured and General Foch was able to order the American troops here, the French troops there, and the British troops some other place, as they were needed.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. General Foch did not have charge of the navies, did he?

Mr. CONNERY. What applied to the Army at that time could very easily apply to the Army and the Navy combined. During a war the President of the United States surely has enough on his hands without calling in Admiral This and General That and trying to compose their differences and getting them to get together to prosecute a war.

I am in favor of this consolidation of the Army and Navy on the principle of national defense.

We had General Mitchell testifying on the Air Corps proposition and then getting out of the service, resigning, because he felt it his duty to bring to the attention of the people the fact that the air force of the United States was not functioning as it should function.

Any future war which we might be unlucky enough to get into would be fought in the air and under the sea, and I believe that we should have a unified air corps in the United States. I believe that we should have a Secretary of National Defense whom the President can call in and say: "This is your job; call in your Army secretary, call in your Navy secretary, call in your Air Corps secretary and tell them what you want done." It would then be a case of not what some admiral wants done or what some general wants done, not the jealousy and the inactivity, and the waiting for the Navy to do this, the Army to do that, and the Air Corps to do something else; but the secretary of national defense would say to the officers: "We are going to attack the enemy. You with your air force will do this; you with your Navy will do that; you with your Army will do that. There is nothing further to be said. You will go out under a unified command and help win this war." [Applause.]

I am in favor of this proposition because I feel it is for the best interest of national defense and the American people. Furthermore, I believe it gives us some real economy. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is an illustration of a legislative panic. For the last 10 years the United States has spent its funds extravagantly and uneconomically. There have been great waste and lack of economy. The country is now facing the result of such procedure. Many individuals have done the same thing. As a matter of fact, probably 95 per cent of our people have been engaged in an orgy of spending. The result is the same to each so far as the Government and its citizens are concerned. Now, the time has come when we must "pay the fiddler." We have danced to a money-mad tune.

It is now being forced upon our attention that there is no more money to throw away and that we must work harder and save more. The people "back home" have directed Congress to stop its wastefulness, its extravagance, and to cut down expenses.

In our effort to obey their commands Congress has been engaged in a valiant effort to retrench. In an effort to cut down expenses in an orderly, sane, well-thought-out manner it was soon found that the majority of the people thought the ax should fall on the tree in the other fellow's yard. "You mustn't touch my pet project or disturb my salary—cut the other fellow first," was the cry. Congress became confused, and maybe a little reckless. The final decision to strike everywhere is evidenced by this bill.

With a few weeks of discussion and without hearings a bill has been brought into the House providing changes in our governmental structure that if properly considered would have taken months. Regardless of fixed economic policies concerning the reduction of the purchasing power of the people, ruthlessly an arbitrary slash of all salaries is made. Regardless of world conditions, this time, when the whole world is upset and no man knows what the next day will bring forth, has been selected as the time to try an experiment with the national defense. Such proceedings can only be the result of panic conditions.

As a further evidence that the condition of panic has swept over Congress as a prairie fire, all party responsibility has been relegated to the rear and normal leadership has been disregarded. Every man is looking out for himself and his own political interests. While I deplore the panic condition that caused this, yet this absence of partisanship seems to afford the only ray of light. With "party" in the rear, patriotism may come to the front as the only guiding motive in our determinations. "What is for the good of the country?" is the sole question. Opinions of men may differ, but the subject can be approached without being beclouded by any partisan charges or motives. This is the spirit in which we should consider our national defense. That is one subject that affects us all—all people and all parties. There is nothing personal or partisan about the defense of the Nation.

This bill provides for the creation of a new executive department to be known as the Department of National Defense, at the head of which shall be a Secretary of National Defense, and under him three assistant secretaries, one for the Army, one for the Navy, and one for a new branch, aviation. At present we have, as you all know, two Secretaries for two departments, the War and the Navy—each department controlling its own aviation functions. Which is the better system, the most efficient, and the most economical? My own opinion is that the present system is far superior.

There could be only two reasons to change our system of national defense. First, to make it more efficient, and, second, to decrease expenditures. Really there should be only one controlling factor—efficiency; for an inefficient system could not be an economical one. If economy was the controlling factor, then scrap our Navy, dismiss the Army, and not spend any money at all. The argument for economy as to the national defense could be reduced to an absurdity.

The proponents for this consolidation say such an argument is unfair to them, that they do not want to destroy our Army and Navy but merely to cut out useless or extravagant expenditures. Then this bill is not necessary, for Congress holds the purse strings and the War and Navy Departments can receive only what is given them by Congress. Committees of Congress have sat patiently for four months working out this very problem after exhaustive hearings and testimony from experts. What experts on the subject of military defense appeared before the Economy Committee and urged such a consolidation as is proposed? How long was this particular subject considered by the Economy Committee? There are 10 titles in the bill, and the Economy Committee has not been in existence two months. There is no way to find out the answers to these questions, for I have not been able to get a copy of the hearings, if there were any. The report of the committee is not very illuminating. It merely says:

> It is expected that such savings as may be effected will arrive by reason of a reduction in the administrative expense and the cost of material and supplies. It is impossible to state just what amount will be saved as a result of this consolidation, but it is estimated from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 per annum may be saved should the provisions of this title be put into effect.

Who estimated this saving, and upon what did he base it? The President, who is the head of our Army and Navy, is quoted by the papers as being against it, so he could not have given the committee the benefit of his great knowledge on the subject. The naval and military experts of the country are not in favor of it, so it is not reasonable to say that the committee based their decision upon the full and accurate knowledge of military experts. Could the members of the Economy Committee in a few weeks, without any information from our military authorities, have decided this question among themselves? It would hardly appear reasonable that any committee would suggest that the House pass this proposal without further authority than this.

And how was the estimated saving obtained? There are no figures given. There is no reference to the various items of the saving or the particulars of same. Did the committee pluck the wide variation of fifty millions of dollars—"from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000"—out of thin air and put it down? Surely not. They would not have done that. But they must have had some figures somewhere in order to make up this total saving. No; they themselves admit that "it is impossible to state just what amount will be saved." Never before in my experience in this House has any committee come before the House with such a striking and unusual statement.

But the committee says the saving will be effected by a reduction in (1) administrative expense, and (2) the cost of material and supplies.

As to saving expenses by the proposed plan of administration, there will be five departments where there are now three. We have now a "head of the national defense" in the person of the President of the United States. Our Constitution says, "The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." He is the controlling and responsible head of our Military Establishment, and the Secretaries of the Army and Navy must report to him. Under this experimental plan a new department—aviation—is created, so that three instead of two heads of departments must report to a new head, the secretary of the national defense; and he in turn must report to the President. Such roundabout procedure could not be conducive to economy. The Army and Navy are now reduced to a minimum of expense, dependent upon the appropriation of Congress as to the amount they expend, and here it is proposed to create another department as an intervening division between the President and the Army and Navy heads, and claim there will be less money spent. The amount necessary to set up this new department will of itself prevent economy. This new department must have its staff and its quarters and a large force of employees, and it can safely be estimated that such a department would result in an added expense of maybe half a million dollars instead of a decrease.

The creation of a new department of aviation would also tend to increase expense of administration necessarily for the same process of reasoning applies. There would have to be an enlarged staff, enlarged quarters, and more employees for it to function properly. It is the experience of all bureaucratic government that the more bureaus there are the greater the expense. Now when we are trying to eliminate some departments, it is strange that the proposal of creating new ones should be brought up.

As to saving expense in the purchase of materials and supplies, this would require a very exhaustive study of the entire question, for there are many angles to it. It has been studied for years by military experts, but it has been found almost impossible to arrange for a central purchasing system for both because of the varied uses of the materials needed for each arm of the service. The small arms, machine guns, and fieldpieces for the Navy are already manufactured by the Army, and the Navy obtains them from the Army. The President, as the Commander in Chief, might work out a trial of such a system, with the assistance of the Army and Navy chiefs, and such a plan might be studied in detail and recommended to Congress at the next session. No law is needed for the President to direct such a study and base his recommendations thereon after due deliberation. It is not necessary to set up a superstaff to have this done. There are, however, already in existence "several agencies for avoiding duplication and insuring coordination." To mention some: The Joint Army and Navy Board, the Aeronautical Board, and a joint Army and Navy planning committee. We also have a General Supply Committee.

The plan proposed would undoubtedly result in such confusion that no economy could or would ensue.

As to efficiency resulting from this plan, the contrary would result. Some go so far as to say that efficiency should not be decreased even if economy might be served. There is a great deal in the view that economy should not be achieved at the expense of efficiency. You must remember that a military service is constituted for purposes of defense in time of need. If it is not efficient, the resultant damage for lack of an efficient fighting force is greater—far greater—in the end than if it had been kept in a state of efficiency. The very efficiency of our Military Establishment stands for economy when the necessity arises for its use. Its efficiency is an insurance that there will be less damage, less cost, and less loss when and if the system has to be put into operation.

There are certain places where the Army and Navy have adjacent locations, but there are not many. Even where they are adjacent, few of these locations have sufficient area for expansion. The Navy must have its operations near the sea, and many of the operations of the land forces are inland. If the land forces were brought to the Navy locations, there would be such congestion that neither economy nor efficiency would be promoted, and, of course, the naval operations could not be carried inland.

When the creation of a third branch of the service is brought into the picture, the confusion becomes greater. Admiral Moffett, United States Navy, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department, made such a convincing statement before the Committee on Expenditures of the House of Representatives on February 6, 1932, that I take the liberty of quoting him. He said, in part:

> The proposed plan would result in greater expense, because the creation of a separate air service would require a large additional air department or organization, similar to the War and Navy Departments, including auxiliary services—supply, medical, etc.

The amalgamation of naval air stations with Army air stations and repair depots will not decrease operating personnel. It will neither decrease military operations nor work to be done.

In the continental limits of the United States, the Navy is restricted by law to 6 heavier-than-air stations, and of these 6, 2 are fleet air bases fronting deep water where fleet vessels load and unload. The personnel of these two repair bases is composed almost entirely of enlisted men who are being trained as able naval aviation mechanics and are rotated periodically between the fleet and air stations. Such is not the case in the Army. In the time of an emergency, they are the available trained nucleus around which rapid technical-personnel expansion takes place for providing the necessary force for commandeered fleet aviation-repair vessels, improvised carriers, and advanced war repair bases.

The general supply problem is distinctive for each service. Military aviation operates under the Air Corps separately in procedure and personnel from the Regular Army. Its system is excellent and well adapted for military aviation. Naval-aviation supply operates directly under the general naval supply system.

The general supply problem for military and naval aviation, especially in peace time, is distinctly different. The Army's set-up is separate from the Regular Army; in the Navy the regular naval supply officer functions for both the regular naval supplies and naval aviation supplies. The same disbursing officer pays the naval aviator that pays the regular naval officer.

To be of real value, the personnel in both the Army and Navy air forces must not only be aviators but must be also soldiers and sailors, thoroughly conversant each with his own arm. Flying of itself alone is of no value. The personnel in the planes are what count, and they must be either soldiers or sailors; they can not be both. It takes years of training to make a Navy man, and additional training to make a naval aviator of real value. We must not forget that a naval aviator is also required to be a naval officer—navigator, seaman, gunnery officer, engineer, radio, and line officer. They must pass the same kind of examinations for promotion as is required of other naval officers.

It would be easier and more practicable for soldiers to man ships than to have Army aviators man naval aircraft, and vice versa. Each is a naval or military specialty in itself. The combination of the two services—the Army Air Corps and the Naval Air Service—would result in inefficiency for both and disaster during war. Aviation is a new war arm. It is, therefore, necessary that both the Army and Navy become thoroughly acquainted with it, and that especially all the personnel of the Navy become familiar with this new weapon and its use. The only way to do this is not to separate aviation and its control in any way from the Navy.

Defeat and disaster due to an undue stress on economy would be more expensive than an efficiency that would function properly and prevent disastrous and calamitous results. The people of this country have been taught this lesson more than once, but as long as we must have a military establishment, then let us have an efficient one.

Peace is greatly to be desired—everyone wants peace—but men have fought since the time of Cain and Abel, and there are more portents and signs of war to-day than there were in 1914. The United States has never fought a war of aggression and it never will. But it must be prepared to defend its flag, its commerce, and its people. The United States will make every effort for disarmament in agreement with the other nations of the world. It will agree to reduce its armament to an equality with any other nation and it will not regard its agreement as a "scrap of paper," but it will not throw away its arms and leave itself defenseless from attack by other nations who do not agree to discard their arms, notwithstanding some misguided pacifists are willing to court disaster in this manner.

In conclusion, this plan is not necessary. Our Army and Navy are in a high state of efficiency and every economy is being used by agencies already in existence. Such agencies are promoting economy far better than could be done under the proposed plan. As it now stands the President is the head of the national defense and does not need a subhead through whom reports may be transmitted from the Army and Navy.

Nor is a separate department for aviation necessary. Good results are being obtained under the present arrangement. England, it is true, has a separate air force, and Admiral Beattie was forced to conclude that if the three forces were reduced to two that "we should save millions of public money with greater efficiency as in the United States."

For more than a century and a quarter we have gone along under our present system. In that time many studies have been made of this question and after each investigation it has been decided that any change of the system would be less economical and less efficient. The report of the Morrow Board was to that effect. This board was composed of Members of the House and Senate, high-ranking officers of the Army and Navy, and three distinguished citizens of the United States. This board unanimously disapproved such an organization as is proposed. The War Department and the Navy Department have made exhaustive studies of the subject and reached the same conclusion. Other nations have studied the subject and turned it down. Have we civilian Members of Congress studied it sufficiently to disregard the unanimous verdict of all military experts throughout the world?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Is it not a fact that neither Great Britain, France, Japan, or Italy has a department of national defense, as suggested in this bill, and is it not a fact that they have a separate army head and a separate navy head?

Mr. DREWRY. Unquestionably that is a fact. The reason they have a system of that kind is that they have very largely adopted the system of the United States.

In 1798 we changed our ideas of national defense as far as the system went and since that time other countries have followed us, and we have to-day the countries that are standing foremost in the world with this kind of defense.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. May I make this one observation? That the German Government is the only one which had any semblance of a national defense department, which was headed by the Kaiser himself, and it was because of that very same fact that the Germans lost the war?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it took the whole world to lick them.

Mr. DREWRY. I did not yield to more than one gentleman.

It is purely an experiment. Surely this is no time to be experimenting with the national defense. Our economic situation precludes us from experiments. Experiments are costly. If it should be tried and the result were unfavorable, the loss would be so great that we should be pushed just that much deeper in the mire of the present depression.

Every authority says that the proposed plan is not economical and not efficient. I for one am forced to the conclusion that they are right. It would not promote economy nor efficiency.

Mr. COLLINS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized against the amendment for five minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this proposition there are two principles which ought to be borne in mind by the membership of this House. The first is to provide a larger measure of national military defense than we have now and the second is to accomplish that at a lessened cost.

During the war we had in existence substantially just what is being proposed here to-day. We found that the Army was placing orders with the industries of the country and prescribing independent priorities as to such orders. We also found that they were asking priorities of the railroad companies of the country.

The Navy was doing identically the same thing without any consideration whatever as to the orders or priorities thereon that were asked by the Army, with the result that industry and transportation were so completely tied up in this country that President Wilson was forced to establish the War Industries Board to regulate and supervise procurement and transportation so as to enable this country expeditiously to get its commodities to ports and so that the industries of the country could cooperate intelligently and avoid having everything tied up in a confused mass that seemed for a time impossible to untangle.

The proposal here is to create an orderly, business method of national defense. That is the first proposal. And whether you like it or not, whether it is done here to-day or not, the next time we have a war, if such an unfortunate thing should happen to us, we are going to carry on that war as we carried on the last one, by a unified service.

It was testified this summer before the War Policies Commission, of which I happened to be a member, that if Mr. Baruch had continued his activities one month longer, he would not have been Mr. Baruch but General Baruch, showing that the tendency was continually toward a unified control.

Now, with reference to the second proposal, the one of economy. Considerable has been said about the Air Service. Let me read you what General Fechet last year told the Appropriations Committee of the House:

Mr. COLLINS. I want to ask one more question, before I forget it. The Government appropriates money for the Air Corps of the Army and the Air Corps of the Navy. I imagine that the appropriation for the Navy for all air activities is about the same as the appropriation for the Army, around $70,000,000. What is your opinion about the adequacy of that sum of money to provide an adequate air force for this Government?

General FECHET. I am firmly convinced that the United States is spending enough money to-day to provide it with an adequate national defense; but, in my opinion, it is not being properly spent.

There is an indictment of your system that you can not get away from. We are spending enough money and we are appropriating enough money, but it is being spent in a manner that should not be encouraged. There is duplication of experimentation, duplication of air activities, duplication of procurement; in fact, duplication confronts us practically at every turn—in radio communication, in the manufacture of clothing, in the production of munitions, in hospitalization, in water transportation, in public-works personnel, and in disbursing and accounting.

Out here at Bolling Field you have two airports immediately adjoining. The same is true at San Diego and at Pearl Harbor. That means duplicated guards, duplicated everything. Go to New York City and see your port facilities there. You have an Army base and a Navy base. Anybody that is conversant with the two knows very well that the Army base is adequate to accommodate both the Navy and the Army.

It is said that the President is opposed to this consolidation. I wonder to what extent that is true. As recently as April, 1924, Mr. Hoover, as Secretary of Commerce, in a letter to Representative MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, relative to a bill in respect to organization and mobilization of industry and the civil population generally in war, stated:

* * * I would, therefore, create an administrator of munitions * * * and would provide that the munitions division of the Army and Navy should be immediately transferred to his direction * * *.

When you remove munitions from dual administration, little else besides personnel remains.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know of but one excuse for the failure of this provision, and that is that the social lobby in Washington does not want it. I fear that this factor has much to do with some of the opposition that has been manifested.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Martin amendment and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to announce that I do not want to be put in the embarrassing position of declining to yield in the limited time I have to present my views, and therefore beg to be pardoned if I request that I be not asked to yield.

The consolidation of the War and Navy Departments is a favorite obsession with so-called efficiency experts. The Economy Committee has evidently fallen under their spell.

The argument for the plan purports to stand on two grounds—economy and efficiency in actual service.

As to economy, not a single speaker for this proposal has given any satisfactory detail to show how the alleged economies may be effected; but even if it did appear that a few economies in administration might ensue, the disadvantages and dangers involved would more than overbalance any alleged saving.

There is something higher and nobler than economy when the interests of our country are involved. Economy can not enter into this problem. This is a problem that will not yield to any mere formula of business thrift or penuriousness.

There is not a single suggestion for saving in administration and in the purchase of supplies that has not been answered and adequately met in the exigencies of war, even under the existing arrangement. It is rather far-fetched and straining at a gnat that because we had a war-purchasing board in the World War we ought therefore to consolidate the two branches of defense.

No one has shown where any substantial saving can be made. Is it in personnel? Hardly. It is surely not intended under the unified plan to reduce the personnel either of the Army or Navy. Is it ordnance? We will still need the same number of guns, the same amount of supplies, of rifles and ammunition, of shot and shell. Is it uniforms or equipage? We will still need the same number of uniforms, the same equipage and equipments. Narrowing the inquiry down, we find that the only avenue in which any savings whatever might be made lies in administration—and some even question whether that is either a probability or a possibility.

The last speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], emphasized the difficulties that we were in during the World War and made a good argument for unity; but have we not unity under the existing system? The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of both forces—the Army and the Navy—and in every war he has exercised his prerogative to coordinate the two branches of defense, and particularly in the World War. This is sufficient. It is not necessary to divide and segregate these departments. Such a plan, if carried into effect, would imperil the future of our country. You would be putting all your eggs in one basket.

My theory, viewing the proposal from the standpoint of history, is that two heads are better than one. In our political system, as heads of executive departments are selected, there is a better chance of getting one good head; that is, making one good shot out of two tries than a bull's-eye out of only one try. The Navy Department deals with problems of the most difficult and intricate character. You might get a man in the Navy who would properly control both departments, but it might be impossible to get a man from the Army to properly control both departments.

The Navy in our history has always been efficient. It has always been prepared. In the War of 1812 General Hull surrendered his army without firing a shot, while his nephew in the Navy, fought the Constitution to a great victory over the Guerriere.

In the Spanish-American War we witnessed a glaring instance of how our success was imperiled by the inefficiency of the heads of the War Department. The soldiers were improperly armed, equipped, fed, and cared for. Whole regiments were sent to the front with obsolete Springfield rifles to combat an army that was equipped with the latest magazine rifles and smokeless powder. The medical department was a disgrace, and thousands of men were sacrified to disease owing to the want of proper preparation.

On the other hand, the Navy Department was adequately equipped and prepared for action; so that, within a few days after war was declared, Dewey was on his way to the Philippines. The men of the Navy were adequately clothed and fed. There were no complaints about embalmed beef or lack of medical supplies and attention. Suppose the Navy Department had the same sort of brains at its head as politics vouchsafed to the Department of War!

I would recommend that the Economy Committee and others interested read the Martial Spirit, by Walter Millis.

In the Civil War, if it had not been for the efficiency of the Navy, under separate control, General Grant would never have been able to make his historic capture of Forts Henry and Donelson. General Halleck was a skilled militarist. He had written books on military strategy, and was supposed to know how campaigns should be planned and conducted, but he could not grasp the proposal of Grant to capture Forts Henry and Donelson. General Grant got in touch with Admiral Foote, and Foote was prepared to take Grant's Army down and make the attack. So it was all through the Civil War—blunders on the part of the Army, efficiency on the part of the Navy. Better keep them separate and allow the President, as Commander in Chief, to coordinate them as the occasion requires.

In the World War the same conditions of inefficiency prevailed until the President intervened and brought order out of chaos. Read Pershing's Memoirs on that subject. [Applause.]

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I consider Title VI now under consideration to consolidate the operations of the Army, Navy, and air forces under a single department of national defense, as about the most unfortunate proposition that could be presented to Congress at this time, and particularly when it comes in this form and with the slight consideration and discussion that can now be given to it.

The proposition to make such a consolidation is refuted by all of the glorious history of our country, on land and on sea. [Applause.]

I am well aware there are those who would seek to minimize the accomplishments of our Armies and our Navies, but every war has shown us that as to both the Army and Navy a divided responsibility, a separate command for each, but yet with the fine cooperation between them that history records, has produced outstanding results to which the whole world had paid acclaim and of which every American citizen may be proud.

I am not going to consider now the question of economy, as time forbids, but it is the consensus of opinion of those who are informed that to maintain an air force for the Army and an air force for the Navy and an independent air force will cost just as much, whether they are under unified control or operated separately. Likewise the cost of feeding, clothing, and transporting soldiers and sailors would be no less if they should be placed under a single department of national defense.

The reason I am not going to consider the alleged economy involved is because I do not propose to set off proposed and uncertain economy against the lives of our soldiers and sailors, against their blood, and against the security of our shores and the welfare of our Nation in time of war. [Applause.]

We have had experiences from the past that it seems to me should guide our steps now. All of them are against the proposed consolidation.

I lay down the proposition without the slightest hesitation that there is no man on this continent to-day who is large enough or who is so constituted mentally or by reason of training and education that he could exercise at the same time unified control and command over the Army and the Navy and the air forces of the Nation. There is no man living so constituted that he is mentally and temperamentally sufficiently unbiased with reference to the various branches of the service that he could apply principles of justice and fairness to each of them without displaying a preference for one over the other.

It is true that there is no man of such gigantic capacity who could successfully and at the same time direct in time of war our forces on land and those on the sea; nor could he understand the perplexing problems of each and the principles of combat which would apply to both.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that is more serious and nerve racking to contemplate or witness in its operation than the staff of either an army or a navy in time of national stress and warfare, and that is all we are maintaining an army and a navy for—to provide security and protection for the days when the life and the welfare of the Nation are threatened by war. Such a situation demands the last atom of capacity and ability and attention and energy which is possible to be given by each and every man constituting such a staff. They well know and understand that the welfare and safety of those engaged in warfare, as well as the security of the Nation, depends upon the successful accomplishment by them of their task.

A staff engaged in the problem of furnishing supplies, conducting transportation, making available munitions for battle, and working out the problems of combat for a force which may extend over a front of many miles, has no time under such conditions to deal with the problems that may confront the Navy and a combat on the seas.

The proper conduct of an efficient staff in time of war means that every man is being used at his highest power, and to the greatest advantage for the purpose of solving the problems that lie before it.

It is perfectly apparent there is no staff or organization that could be perfected that would be competent in time of war to handle the manifold problems of the Army and at the same time those of the Navy and air forces without breaking down, signally failing, and bringing disaster to our Nation. [Applause.] This of necessity comes from the varied and different conditions under which an army and a navy would operate and from the great distance that frequently would separate them in their respective activities.

I say to you, that an organization which places an army under a competent leader and staff, and a navy under a competent leader and staff can deal better with the perplexing problems of war than would be possible under a single department of national defense.

We should not engage in an untried experiment that is fraught with such terrible consequences at this time when the judgment of the military experts of the world and our own experience is recorded against it.

Can any man conceive how the pages of history would be changed if Wellington had been in command of the land and naval forces of England; and likewise what might have been the result if Lord Nelson had not only commanded the navy but the army? It would have been a "confusion worse confounded."

One can not contemplate such a situation with the slightest composure. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, during the last Congress a commission was appointed consisting of 6 Cabinet members, 4 Members of the Senate, and 4 Members of the House, known as the War Policies Commission.

I had the privilege of serving on that commission. There appeared before that commission, introduced by the present Secretary of War, Barney Baruch, who during the war was chairman of the War Industries Board. He was a man who performed signal service for his country and was honored by his country and by foreign nations. In five minutes it is impossible for me to go into his testimony at any great length, but I believe it would be worth while for every Member of this House, and, for that matter, for every man and woman in the country, to read the statement and testimony of Barney Baruch.

It was given more than 10 years after the war closed, made calmly; and with the interest of his country at heart, he pointed out to the commission the handicap under which this country entered the World War.

While the commission was limited by authority of the resolution appointing it, and they gave consideration more especially to supplies, yet I believe there is no man that can read the testimony of Barney Baruch and fail to come to the conclusion that the thing we need in the interest of public defense and economy is the combination of all arms of defense into one general department of national defense. [Applause.]

I do not know how much money can be saved, but let me say to you gentlemen that the man who had charge of the purchasing of war supplies for the World War testified before our committee that if we had had a uniform system of purchasing supplies—and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] says that this bill would ruin the efficiency of the Army and Navy. Listen to the words of the man who purchased the supplies in the World War. He says:

It would reduce the cost of war by 50 per cent and I believe by an even greater figure.

[Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. No; I can not yield. I have only five minutes. I am giving you his statement, the statement of the man who had the duty of purchasing these supplies, a statement made 10 years after the close of the war.

Have you ever stopped to think that if another war comes the thing that is proposed to be done in this bill will in effect be done, and that it will be absolutely necessary before all of our arms of national defense can begin to function that there be a single head to direct?

Combining the War Department and the Navy Department into one department of national defense should be done not only in the interest of economy, but in the interest of our national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. In five minutes one can barely scratch the surface of this important proposition. It is ridiculous to expect the Members of Congress to vote to change drastically the old established policy of our national defense, which carried us successfully through the World War, after a brief consideration allowed under this economy bill. If, as the previous speaker stated, Mr. Barney Baruch indicated that we must follow this proposition in order to maintain an adequate defense, then why during the World War did not the Democratic administration of Mr. Baruch consolidate the Army and the Navy? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], in support of the Army and Navy consolidation, indicated that the allied forces on land were under the concentrated direction of General Foch.

Is that an argument in favor of consolidating the Army and the Navy? The navies of the nations engaged in the conflict on the side of the Allies in the World War were not united with the armies under the central, unified control of General Foch. Therefore, if Mr. CONNERY looks to the World War for a precedent upon which to predicate his position on the pending consolidation, he should oppose it instead of supporting it. As the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] has indicated, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments held extensive hearings on this Army and Navy consolidation proposition. Only two witnesses appeared in favor of the bill, Mr. BYRNS, the author, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, who is the real author of this consolidation, whose bill Mr. BYRNS copied practically in toto.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman ought not to make that statement, because it is not so.

Mr. SCHAFER. Who else testified before that committee in favor of the consolidation?

Mr. BYRNS. I am talking about the bill and the statement about it that the gentleman just made.

Mr. SCHAFER. In the last Congress Mr. WILLIAMSON introduced a bill.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman said that I copied that bill, and that is not true.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, your bill was introduced after his, anyhow, and the gentleman can not deny that. The latest author of the Army and Navy consolidation bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments with the cry of economy and testified how much savings were going to be had. If any Member of the House ought to know if any savings can be had and where, then the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who has been on that committee for many years, appropriating for the Army and Navy, ought to have some tangible, definite idea; but he, in answer to a question, indicated that he could not put his finger on any tangible saving.

The Expenditures Committee, after careful and lengthy consideration, voted to kill the Byrns consolidation bill.

In the Economy Committee report on this drastic policy of overturning our national-defense policy there is but one paragraph with reference to this title of the economy bill. The report of the Economy Committee does not even inform the Members of the House that they could obtain a copy of those hearings which the Committee on Expenditures held. It is rather remarkable that on this radical change of our policy of national defense, the Economy Committee report on this bill was not available until the morning that the bill was first considered. There is just one brief paragraph on the Army and Navy consolidation in that report and no printed hearings on the economy bill available, and the Members of the House of Representatives are now asked to vote for the Army and Navy consolidation monstrosity, which was killed after hearings and many days of executive sessions in the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Is it any wonder that many people in America are tempted to hold this Congress in disrespect? No one except the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the author, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] testified in favor of this consolidation.

Are we going to follow that kind of economy hysteria? Mr. BYRNS stands one way to-day on the consolidation and another way to-morrow, just as he did on the Interior Department appropriation bill. Before our committee he was going to save $200,000,000, but could not definitely point to where one penny could be saved, and a couple of weeks later he signs the report of the Economy Committee and indicates that only about $50,000,000 will be saved. If we want to follow that sort of economy, then we might just as well provide for an appropriation of $1 for these establishments; and if there is a future war, hire the Mexican Army and the Chinese Navy and put all of our admirals and generals who know something about fighting into the ranks of the unemployed, place the Mexican Army and the Chinese Navy in charge of Admiral BYRNS, Gen. Barney Baruch, and General WILLIAMSON and tell them to fight the enemy, save the lives of our people and the Nation. This consolidation gives one Cabinet officer unlimited authority to consolidate, eliminate, expand, and create, and practically do anything he desires with the War Department and Navy Department, and almost a billion dollars a year expended for our national defense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, if there is one subject in this bill that any Member of this House who is studious and follows legislation could obtain information about, it is this subject. The matter of the consolidation of the Army and the Navy has been before Congress for many years. It became very acute and has been discussed from the time of the General Mitchell court-martial. I can not in this minute discuss the strategy of the next war, but anyone who keeps informed on modern weapons of warfare must know that the safest place in the next war will be in the first-line trench. Every city will be the target of attack. Every woman, child, and noncombatant under continuous danger of life. The next war will be terrible, terrifying, and cruel. In every emergency we have had, we have had considerable loss of time, energy, and money by reason of the conflict between the two branches of the national defense. Mr. Chairman, one of the first orders issued after a few months of wrangling in the World War was to put a unified command in every place where it was possible. The marines fought at Chateau-Thierry just as well under a military command as the Army transport cooperated under naval command for the transportation of troops. The Navy manned the big siege guns on the western front efficiently and effectively under the Army. If there is one subject that we have complete information on, it is this item in the bill. Gentlemen have been asking for a bill of particulars. The cost of ordnance in the Army alone is $10,000,000, and $12,000,000 in the Navy; considering obsolescence, repairs, experiment cost, necessary reserve, we could save in those items alone $5,000,000. In the Medical Corps maintenance, supplies, housing, hospitals, we could save at least $1,000,000, and that is a conservative estimate.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sorry. I can not.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Tell us how it could be saved.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the purchase of supplies, food and clothing, nonmilitary supplies, or let us call it the business end of the Army and Navy, there is an item of $110,000,000 in the Army and Navy. Conceding a saving of 5 per cent alone, there is $5,500,000.

In aviation, preliminary training, supplies, equipment, maintenance, we are spending during the current fiscal year for Army, $31,000,000; Navy, $31,000,000. We can save from fifteen to eighteen million dollars there. No one can contradict that figure, with the experience we have had in aviation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sorry. I do not have time.

In the matter of transportation and communication there would be a saving. The total cost is $19,000,000. There would be a saving of at least $1,000,000.

In overhead and administration, a combined cost of $11,000,000. Surely we can save $1,100,000.

For years, by reason of the new weapons of warfare, there has been a conflict as to who should take jurisdiction over the coast defense. The Navy claims jurisdiction over the coast defense. The Army claims jurisdiction over the coast defense. We know that the attack will be from the air and under the water, and the only way to solve that controversy is to establish one national defense, and let that unified command have complete power and responsibility of our coast defense.

Mr. Chairman, so much has been stated to-day on this item, and some of the chief opponents of Army and Navy consolidation have been those who are willing to vote economies on matters with regard to which we had no information at all, let me say to my colleagues who have been criticizing me for trying to save the American family and the American scale of wages, if you want to economize, if you want to increase the efficiency of our national defense, here is the opportunity to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I have been a member of the Subcommittee on Army Appropriations for four years and the Subcommittee on Navy Appropriations for nine years. I believe there is no saving that can be made by consolidation that can not be made without it, and I believe that consolidation will result in terrific increases in cost. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. The great respect that I hold for the chairman of the committee, Mr. McDUFFIE, and his associates who have labored so earnestly in the preparation of a measure that seeks to reduce the expenditures of the National Government makes it exceedingly difficult for me to make any suggestion that is not in complete harmony with the recommendations of the committee.

However, when it is proposed that the two national defense arms of the Nation, the War and Navy Departments, be combined, the problem becomes so definite, so serious, that I must indicate to the House my thought upon the proposition.

From very close association with this subject during the last 10 years, and as one who believes in teamwork looking to the reduction of national armaments, I can not feel that the recommendation that is made by the committee is in the interest either of sound national policy or economy from the standpoint of the coming year or from the standpoint of any considerable number of years.

I am opposed to it because I believe that the essence of our Government institutions, with relation to any crisis, should be efficiency. I am opposed to it because there is to-day not a divided but a united national defense in our country, under one head, namely, the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States. [Applause.]

I am opposed to it because I believe that from the standpoint of economy it is a false trail.

The burden of proof is upon those who urge this title to show, item by item, where economies can be made.

CONTRARY TO EXPERIENCE OF NATIONS

The proposition of combining the War and Navy Departments is not new.

When our Government was organized, these two agencies of defense were one; but as the question was studied, it became apparent to the fathers within a very few years that a better plan would be to separate the two activities, with the result that during the administration of John Adams the Navy Department was created as a department distinct from the Department of War. Thus for 135 years it has been the established policy of the Government to maintain these two definite arms of our country's defense.

The policy of the United States is the policy that is followed by most great powers. I do not mean that this factor alone should be controlling, but I do mean that it should be impelling as a challenge to be sure of our ground before we make a change.

Following the World War Great Britain found herself burdened with enormous indebtedness and confronted with heavy annual financial responsibilities. How to reduce the expenditures of government was a serious problem, and in 1922 a committee was appointed by the British Government which gave intensive study to this question, with the result that the committee reported adversely upon the proposed union of the military and naval defenses of the British Government. A later study was made of the question. You will recall that during the last year the British Government was face to face with an economic crisis. Expenditures had to be reduced; ways had to be found for the budget to be balanced. Another examination was made to determine whether or not upon further consideration the war and navy departments of Great Britain could be combined. In spite of the stress of necessity for the saving of every expenditure, the decision was adverse upon this proposition.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Briefly.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Does the gentleman know that the so-called Morrow Board, appointed by President Coolidge in 1926, which gave two months' study to the effect of consolidation of aviation in the Army and the Navy, a board of which the gentleman from Georgia and myself happened to be practically the only legislative members, found unanimously against the efficiency of consolidating those two services?

Mr. FRENCH. The statement is true, and I was about to refer to the study and the conclusion.

WHAT DOES THE PROPOSAL MEAN?

As we turn then to the proposition in the bill of combining the War and Navy Departments of Government we naturally ask, What does it mean? Does it mean reduction of officers and men? Does it mean the elimination of naval craft? Does it mean material modification of these two establishments? I think not.

These objects can be sought equally as well with the departments separate as though they were combined.

NOT IN THE INTEREST OF SOUND ECONOMY

In my judgment the proposed amalgamation of the departments is not in the interest of sound economy. If it were found to be contrary to best national policy, then any combination that we would make to-day would necessarily be temporary. If temporary, no justification in the name of economy can be urged.

It can not be sustained upon the basis of a temporary expediency for the reason that greater expenditures would need to be met in making adjustments between the two services than would be the cost of continuing the two services as they now are with whatever adjustments properly may be made to meet the present economic situation.

Economies can not be effected unless reductions may be made in personnel, in ships, in abandonment of plants and warehouses, in abandonment of matériel; but all of these modifications would mean expenditures and not economies if the program were to be but temporary.

If, as I believe, the program is contrary to sound policy, then not only would ineffectual efforts be made to reduce the burden of expenditure during the next year or during the next several years, but added expenditures would be required in reassembling the disturbed branches of the establishment when separate departments again would be established.

WHERE WOULD ECONOMIES BE FOUND?

Would economies be found in personnel? Pay is the largest item of expense that enters into each branch of the service. Unless reduction in numbers of officers and enlisted and civilian personnel be made, this item would not be disturbed. As to pay, which is to-day more than two-thirds of the entire budget of the Navy and considerably more than that of the Army, the item would be no more, no less.

Would economies be found in construction or repair of ships? With the exception of a few transports or supply ships, tugs, dredges, and small harbor craft connected with the engineering work of the War Department, practically all the craft of the United States in her military establishments belong to the Navy. Ships are built in navy yards by private contract. Ships are repaired for the most part in navy yards under the Government, though the War and Navy Departments draw to some extent upon private establishments for this service. Each particular job is complete within itself. Whether bids or estimates be called for by an officer called the Secretary of National Defense or the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, it is difficult to see how there could be any differences whatever in this item.

More than that, under existing law, amplified in another section in the particular bill which we have before us for consideration, provision is made for the utilization of utilities and facilities of one department in the handling of work of other departments.

Would reduction be made in aircraft? In large part the air services of the Army and Navy are distinct; in part they are common. The Navy, generally speaking, has to do with activities at sea; the Army with activities over land areas. The Navy must have its airplane carriers, its repair ships, its flying decks, its catapults, its shore bases; with all of which the Army has nothing to do. On the other hand, the Army has its great landing stations or bases, its planes, its shops, its fields. There may be some duplication in certain types of planes that are interchangeable between Army and Navy.

To the extent that this may be true and to the extent that fields and training stations may be used in common, the problem of working out a united use is one that can be handled by the two departments quite as well as by the amalgamation of the two departments into one. It may be that upon this subject further studies should be made, but I believe that if we can work out a program of utilization of planes for certain types of Navy work that can be used interchangeably for Army and for Navy, the problem can be met quite as effectively under existing institutions as through the amalgamation of the two services.

Pilots must be trained differently. Navy pilots must be well versed in navigation, must know problems of the sea, must know technique not required of Army pilots; while, on the other hand, the Army pilot must know in a broad way problems that are peculiar to the Army.

Is it proposed to amalgamate the great training academies of the two institutions, West Point and Annapolis? This has been suggested. At West Point and at Annapolis the Government has invested millions of dollars.

What economy could possibly be served by the amalgamation of the two plants by the education for distinct careers of two groups of students as one? In order that Annapolis might take care of the enrollment at West Point you would need to enlarge the physical plant at Annapolis, or for West Point to handle the present enrollment at Annapolis you would need to enlarge the physical plant at West Point. Surely this course is not in the interest of economy.

Is it proposed that economies be effected in supplies? If so, I ask how? Clothing, shoes, uniforms for the different branches of the service—these articles are required in such abundance that upon the basis either of contract or of fabrication in shops, under the management of either department, it is difficult to see how economies could be served through amalgamation of the departments.

As to food supplies the problem is much the same. The great food stores necessary for the Army and for the Navy are purchased upon the basis of competitive bidding, and it is quite beyond reason to suppose that economies could be served through a united service.

It does not seem that economies could be served in the fabrication of guns or powder or other munitions. Establishments are already in existence under both departments. Investments have been made. And where we purchase, we do so by calling for bids and in large quantities. Were the particular products identical for both institutions, even then it would not be clear that economies could be attained through amalgamation. The War and Navy Departments do teamwork in purchases and the great guns of the Army were manufactured by the Navy.

This is a problem of administration, and it can be handled under present conditions with the effectiveness that it could be handled under a united service.

I have given considerable attention to the study of proposals that in the flying fields of the two services and in the warehouses economies might be effected through amalgamation. It is very possible that there is some slack here that but for present investments could be saved. But again the problem, in my judgment, can be handled by administration. We must approach the question from the standpoint of present investments, and in handling the problem we must determine whether we have not more to lose through the scrapping of established landing fields and buildings and the expansion and modification of other fields and plants so that they will meet the needs of both services.

As regards medical officers and hospital facilities, where it has been suggested that we have an excessive number of both, and in the latter an unjustifiable investment, may I say that the medical departments of both services are not maintained upon the basis of existing officer and enlisted strength of either service. Adequate hospitals can not be maintained that have bed capacities that under normal times are absolutely filled. There ought to be free beds at all times, so that in event of epidemic, in event of emergency, those who are afflicted may receive care. What is true of hospital facilities is true of medical and dental officers. It would be true under any plan.

THE PRESIDENT AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Consider again the question of holding these two services separate or amalgamating them from the standpoint of the President of the United States. The President of the United States by the Constitution is the Commander in Chief of the military and naval forces of our country.

The defenses of the United States involve a problem of such magnitude that unquestionably recognition of Cabinet rank should be given to the one immediately responsible to the President.

In part, the two services are alike; that is, both services exist for the defense of the United States; but, in part, they are distinct. From the standpoint of technique, they are separate services and must always remain so. But from either standpoint, either that of technique of the two services or the magnitude of the problem of the welfare of our country, it is sound policy that two strong men, and not one, constitute the President's responsible advisers.

More than that, were you to amalgamate the two departments into one and create one Cabinet officer you would have confused the issue. You would have removed the War and Navy Departments one step further from the President of the United States, and thus you would have lessened his responsibility.

That the activities might function with highest efficiency there would need to be not only one strong man—a sort of superman—to fill the office of secretary of national defense but there would need to be three strong assistant secretaries to the secretary of national defense who would be at the head of their respective services, but who would not have places at the President's table. The Commander in Chief of the forces of the United States thus would be compelled to listen, so far as the Cabinet meetings were concerned, to the Cabinet officer who might be impressed unduly with the Army or with the Navy or with the air service, whereas he ought to have as his advisors Cabinet officers capable of viewing both the Army and the Navy together, with the effect that the air service of each would have upon the situation.

So important and fundamental do I regard this aspect of the question that in my judgment the President would be compelled to have a sort of private conference table where would sit from time to time not the Secretary of National Defense but the Assistant Secretary for War, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and the Assistant Secretary for Air that you propose to create, and it might be that he would need to rely more upon the judgment of these advisers than upon the adviser who would fill the position of member of the Cabinet.

Finally, in my judgment, we must have regard for the esprit de corps of officers and men. We must respect at least the traditions of the past. We must have regard for that friendly and admirable rivalry that exists, that always has existed, and that for the attainment of greatest efficiency ought to carry on. Nothing is more fundamental than that when men, even of considerable ability and genius, have been stripped in large measure of the necessity of constantly being upon their toes in order that they may attain the greatest success and outdo their competitors they slump back, they retrograde. It would be true here. One of the finest factors making for the success of the Army and Navy of the United States is the healthy rivalry that has as its objective not personal preferment but exceptional attainment in a great program that strives to answer the question which of these activities can serve best, which can give most to the country to which they are dedicated? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I presume that a large majority of the members of this committee were in the same frame of mind when we started consideration of this amendment that I was, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments when we commenced our hearings on this same bill. If I had any inclination or any bias in the beginning, I was inclined to consolidate the Army and Navy. We went into this matter for many, many weeks. We studied the question with a view of effecting economies and from the standpoint of efficiency. It is a big problem and can not be lightly treated. The future welfare of this country, in some respects, is at stake. I therefore trust you will weigh well your action on this amendment.

Our committee gave careful study and careful consideration. It was an intensive study. At the end I came to the conclusion that there is no real justification for the consolidation of these two great departments. Suppose there is a little overlapping here and there, as perhaps there is in the purchasing of supplies. When you go into that, however, you will find it has been greatly magnified. The unnecessary duplication of expenses has been greatly exaggerated. There is very little that could be said in criticism along that line, the statement of the gentleman from New York to the contrary notwithstanding. He took his figures, I am sure, from the hearings of the Appropriations Committee. They show appropriations and not savings.

I am also persuaded that this matter of little differences that have arisen between these two departments is a minor matter. There are already constituted and organized in the Army and Navy joint boards which handle these problems, which work out these differences; and over a long series of years, since the creation of these boards, very, very few disputes have ever gone up to the President for settlement. These joint boards of the Army and Navy are doing good work.

These boards are working together. Surely the Secretary of National Defense could not do more than the President can do. Moreover, the Chief Executive is already in a position now to settle these troubles any time anything of importance or moment arises. The greatest test, after all, is whether we get results. Our history in war times and in peace times shows that we do get results. With all our little mistakes our record is a glorious one and one of which we can be proud.

The creation of this supersecretary, or the Secretary of National Defense, with all his necessary help, would not save anything that we could find. As I said, we were unbiased and unprejudiced and went into the proposition carefully. What would follow? You would have to have an Assistant Secretary of War with his staff; you would have to have an Assistant Secretary of the Navy with his staff; an assistant Secretary of Aviation with his staff; then you would have to have the Secretary of National Defense with his staff, and the sum total is, you have added to, instead of subtracting from, the personnel and expense.

Other nations have made investigations and studies of this and they have discarded it as not being a proper method of handling the Army and Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I yield for a very brief question.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman agree with me that if it were not for the advocates of a combined air service this proposition would not get 15 votes in the House of Representatives?

Mr. COLTON. I think there is a good deal to what the gentleman has said. I feel sure that if careful study is made of the whole subject, this motion to strike out the title will prevail.

These are two distinct services. There is overlapping, ladies and gentlemen, between the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department. In the very nature of things they do similar work in some lines. Would you combine them because of that? We have given the President, in a previous title, the right to organize coordinating services, services along the same line, but do hope you will not mistake this proposition and say that because the Army and the Navy are both engaged in national defense, that they run along the same lines. Some make the mistake in believing that the two departments do the same work.

They do not. The basic unit of the Army is the man with the gun. Around the Infantry we build our plan of defense. Other branches are aids to the man in the Infantry. He serves a distinct purpose in the plan of defense. In the Navy you have an entirely different proposition. The basic unit in the Navy is the vessel or the battleship. The two engineering propositions are entirely different. You might just as well take any other two departments of government and combine them.

Mr. Chairman, the men on the Expenditures Committee were disinterested. There is not a Navy activity in my district; there is not an Army activity in my district save a practically unused arsenal. We had no favors to ask; we had none to extend. We went into it carefully, and I say to you again, as has been said time and again, not one single concrete bit of evidence came before our committee that would show a saving, but, on the other hand, a great deal of evidence came to show that there would be an increased expense.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the committee that all time has expired except 16 minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts, opposed to the amendment, yielded back one minute.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio for one minute.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements that have been made as to the impracticability of this plan, and that is the only thing I care to discuss in this one minute, I will say that this statement appears in the New York Times under a Paris date line of March 2, in which is discussed the organization of the ministry of Andre Tardieu. This newspaper article follows:

The council approved a plan submitted by François Piétri for the organization of the new ministry of national defense. This far-reaching change in the political structure of the Government comprehends the coordination of the functions of the former Ministries of War, Marine, and Air, rather than their fusion.

In the new ministry there will be three directing bodies—command, administration, and armaments—under the common authority of the minister of national defense. All questions of command will come under the minister, aided by the vice presidents of the superior war council and the three chiefs of the general staffs of the army, marine, and air forces. One of the under secretaries of state will direct the administration of the ministry and another will supervise questions concerning war materials of all sorts.

France is the most militaristic nation on the globe. Her problems are far more similar to ours than are those of England; and what is good for a nation like that ought to be good for us.

This provision to consolidate the Army, Navy, and Air Corps under one head is the only provision left in this bill that affords any opportunity for real economy. I feel that if this provision is defeated we might just as well defeat the whole bill and declare our efforts at economy futile.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking under difficulty, and I would like to ask the members of the committee kindly to give me their attention, and I want to make the further request that I be not interrupted. I would be glad to yield if I had more time, but I will be able to present only some of the facts to which I would like to call to your attention if I had more time.

Something has been said about this bill. Let me say for the second time that I did not draw it. I have never claimed any credit for the preparation of it. It was too intricate and involved for me to undertake myself, so I asked the legislative counsel to prepare it, and the title that is incorporated in the economy bill is the bill which was prepared by that office.

I take particular pleasure in making that statement now, because I want you to know that when you come to vote you are voting upon a bill which has been carefully prepared by your own counsel.

For 10 or 12 years there has been an effort to consolidate the War and Navy Departments. It has been recommended during that time by a President of the United States, and presumably with the concurrence of his entire Cabinet, with the exception of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. It has been indorsed by prominent students of national affairs throughout the country. Several boards have been appointed. Gentlemen have referred to the Morrow Board. I have always understood that the Morrow Board was constituted for the purpose of giving particular attention to aviation. There was the Lampert committee appointed by this House, which recommended consolidation. Then there was the reorganization committee headed by the present Postmaster General, Mr. Brown, to which President Harding made his recommendation for a consolidation. I do not vouch for its correctness, but a gentleman told me he had seen with his own eyes the original draft of the report of that committee which included the recommendation of President Harding for a consolidation of the War and Navy Departments. Afterwards, and before it was made public, opposition appeared. In this report, in the minority views, is a statement by Senator HARRISON and Judge Walton Moore, who were members of that committee, that the recommendation made by President Harding was not concurred in because of Cabinet interference; and that is your trouble to-day, gentlemen.

The thing that has defeated this proposal during the entire 10 or 12 years has been the social contacts here in the city of Washington. [Applause.]

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are vigorously opposing it just as their predecessors defeated the recommendation for consolidation in 1924.

It is a singular fact that while we always have a civilian at the head of these departments, the most of them immediately upon assuming office become little more than the mouthpiece of the higher officers in their respective departments. The surprising thing about it is that even the President of the United States, who has been pleading for consolidation, has openly expressed his opposition to the consolidation of the War and Navy Departments, notwithstanding more money could be saved in this way than by any other consolidation which might be effected, and in spite of the fact that back in 1923, when he was a member of President Harding's Cabinet, he was understood to be in entire accord with his chief on the subject.

The most powerful lobby in Washington to-day is the social lobby [applause], and there is not a man on the floor of this House who does not know it. The inarticulate voice back home, to which many have referred, when it comes in conflict with that kind of a lobby has not much chance to be heard.

The gentleman from Oregon criticized the Economy Committee because this proposal is included in the pending bill.

I wonder what the constituents of my friend the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] are going to say when they learn of their position that these so-called experts in the Army and the Navy should alone be consulted with reference to national-defense legislation. That is a very peculiar position for anyone to take on this floor. It is just as logical as to say that these officers should alone be consulted with reference to the amount of pay which they receive and that Federal employees should alone have a voice with reference to salary reduction.

I introduced a consolidation bill and the gentleman from South Dakota had previously introduced one. Those two bills were before the Committee on Expenditures. Groups of high-ranking Amy and naval officers—and I have great respect for them—congregated, as you know, at every hearing held by that committee, so that on the day I went over there I could hardly get into the committee room in order to present my views upon the bill. Your Committee on Expenditures, after weeks of hearings, rejected it by a small vote. Then the Economy Committee, acting in accordance with the resolution which created it, very properly placed it in the pending economy measure.

I want to tell you, gentlemen, that there is not a provision of this economy bill which will save anything like the amount of money that will result from the proper administration of a consolidation of these two departments.

You are saving considerable money by your salary cut, but that is temporary. Various estimates have been made as to what will be saved by this consolidation. Some say $40,000,000, some $50,000,000, and some $100,000,000. I have had Army officers and naval officers tell me confidentially—and they asked me not to mention their names, because they said they would be plucked or punished in some way if it were known—it would save 20 per cent of the cost of the Army and the Navy to this country when it was fully in effect.

Oh, the propaganda that has gone out over the country! As you know, that is the way they defeat these things. They say, "Oh, you are trying to break down our security against attack; you are trying to tear down the national defense of the country." There is not one word of truth in it. This proposal provides—as you will find if you read it—for one Secretary of National Defense. Under him is an Assistant Secretary for War, an Assistant Secretary for the Navy, and an Assistant Secretary for Aviation. It does not seek to combine the Army and the Navy and it will not serve to combine the Army and the Navy. You will still have your General Staff in the Army and you will still have your Office of Naval Operations in the Navy. The only difference this makes, so far as your national defense is concerned, is the unification of your air corps, which will bring about coordination between those two services now in the Army and in the Navy. It will make for coordination and efficiency in both the Army and the Navy in purchasing, equipping, supplying, hospitalization, recruiting, manufacturing, and so forth.

The Government is spending this year around $60,000,000 specifically for aviation in the two departments. This is exclusive of pay and maintenance of military and naval personnel and other incidental expenses amounting approximately to $70,000,000 more.

Twenty-seven million dollars is being expended this year on new equipment.

Will anyone question but what there would be immense saving by the unification of the air activities in these two departments in the purchase of planes, equipment, and the maintenance and operation of air stations?

Talk to me about present cooperation and coordination. They can not even agree upon a football game, and you gentlemen know it. [Applause.] Only a few years ago the head of the Army activities in Hawaii and the head of the naval district in Hawaii, living there upon the respective reservations, almost side by side, did not even speak to each other. They would not recognize each other on the street, and I am told that if it were known one was going to a social gathering the other made it a point to stay away. Then talk to me about coordination and cooperation. That could not have happened if they had both been under one department head. I wish I had an hour and a half so I could tell you of many things in connection with this proposition.

Where does this saving arise? It is going to come from one source alone. It will not affect your Army; it will not affect your Navy; and it will greatly strengthen and improve aviation. I am not claiming reductions in so far as these fighting forces are concerned, nor am I seeking it. The saving is going to come in the administrative expenses.

Now, gentlemen, I am talking earnestly to you. You have talked about economy. We have all talked about it. This bill, the papers tell us this morning, has had $67,000,000 taken out of it. Now you have a motion to take from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 more out of it.

How much is paid the civilian personnel in your War and Navy Departments down in Potomac Park? You pay the stupendous sum of over $10,000,000. Think of it, over $10,000,000, and in addition to that you have 1,085 officers of the Army and Navy down there doing office duty, costing in all approximately $15,000,000 in administration represented here in the city of Washington. Will anyone be so foolish as to contend that expense can not be saved by a consolidation of that overhead. That is not all. How much do you suppose the Government is spending on matériel in the Army and Navy under two separate heads? There is not a business concern in the world that would pursue our present policy, and you know it. Gentlemen here say it will not save any money. I can not believe they know what is being spent or they would not make statements like that.

The Government is spending on matériel for the Navy, under the appropriations just passed by the House, $158,876,075. In the Army, on the basis of estimates submitted, it will spend $88,631,092, or a total for supplies and matériel of $247,507,167. Now, can you look a man seriously in the face and say that if you combine the supply activities of both under one purchasing authority you will not save money? It is ridiculous in the extreme, and I repeat that there is not a commercial concern which could last for one minute if it had a great business like this pursuing our present methods. A saving of only 10 per cent would amount to $25,000,000. And pray tell me how such a combination and such a saving would in the slightest manner affect the efficiency or the strength of your national defense?

I ask you, gentlemen, how many recruiting offices there are in your cities. I have three in mine—an Army, a Navy, and a Marine Corps recruiting station. Is there any reason in my city or in yours to maintain three such separate stations?

Over here at Bolling Field you will find two air stations side by side, and no one can tell where the dividing line is, but let an Army plane happen to land with one wheel over on the Navy side, and there is trouble. You have two machine shops over there, and one machine shop will hardly lend a tool to the other.

I know that you will save money if you combine these departments. Why have all your Navy shore stations and all your Army posts and depots running under different heads? When you stop to think about it, and when you think about the consolidations that can be made, the statement of a saving of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 will impress you as a reasonable sum.

The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] appeared before his own Committee on Expenditures, and, as will appear from the hearings, enumerated just what savings could be made by way of consolidations. The following is an excerpt from his testimony:

The points advanced by Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War, against the bill (H. R. 4742) contain little that has not already been answered in my analysis of the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, and for that reason I shall not take time now to discuss them, as I desire to call the attention of the committee to some of the advantages which I conceive might be realized by the consolidation of the War and Navy Departments into a Department of Defense.

The general objects to be attained by the proposed creation of a Department of Defense may be summarized, as follows:

1. Economies in administration, standardization, purchases, and transportation.

2. Added efficiency through unity of supervision, closer cooperation, and singleness of command in time of war.

3. The development of an air force commensurate with its importance in modern warfare.

We shall have made out a case for the establishment of a Department of Defense if we can prove either of the following propositions:

1. That the consolidation proposed will effect economies without weakening our defense against a possible enemy.

2. That such consolidation will result in a more powerful defense with no increase of expenditures.

3. That with less expense we may develop a more powerful defensive machine than is possible with the present set-up.

It will not be possible for me to discuss all of the above propositions in detail without unduly wearying you, and I shall, therefore, not attempt it, but I do want to go into them sufficiently to justify my belief that the set-up proposed in the bill is sound in principle and in the interest of economy and efficiency in both peace and war. If this can not be shown our case fails.

That large economies can be realized with competent administration seems to me almost axiomatic. Under the arrangement, the General Staff of the Army and the General Board of the Navy would be abolished and a new general staff set up, composed of representatives of the Army, Navy, and air force, of which the under secretaries would be members. This staff would become the controlling administrative and policy-forming group acting under the immediate direction of the Secretary of Defense. Under such a set-up it would be possible to—

(a) Relieve a considerable part of the present civilian personnel of the Army and Navy;

(b) Standardize equipment, such as guns, ammunition, torpedoes, aircraft, and engines;

(c) Consolidate purchases, stocks, supply depots, airports, experimental and manufacturing plants, and disbursing agencies; and

(d) Consolidate and completely reorganize the transportation system.

If the matters just enumerated were undertaken in good faith, it is inconceivable that large economies would not result. In the extension of my remarks some of these subheads will be treated in detail in an effort to show just what can be done in the way of effecting economies by proper consolidation and reorganization.

The consolidation of purchases and stocks will not only effect initial savings by buying in larger lots, thereby reducing costs of goods and transportation, but it will enable the Government to buy comparatively less for each unit, thereby resulting in a smaller investment, a more rapid turnover, and hence, less spoilage and obsolescence.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, appeared before the same committee and made a most illuminating statement advocating and earnestly insisting upon these two departments being consolidated. The opposition, as the hearings will show, was confined alone to the two Secretaries whose Cabinet jobs are at stake and a few high naval and Army officers.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Does the gentleman know of any reason why one clothing factory could not make the clothing for both of the services, instead of having a separate establishment for each service?

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely not. You have clothing establishments at Jeffersonville, Ind., at Philadelphia, and in New York City making clothing, one for the Army, one for the Navy, and one for the Marine Corps. Do not tell me that you can not consolidate and save money, and it ought to be done. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BYRNS and Mr. MARTIN of Oregon.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 153, noes 135.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the committee, it is our hope and our purpose to complete the next title, then read the title with reference to veterans, without offering amendments, and adjourn for the day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman evidently means the next two titles, and then read Title IX.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; in other words, my intention was to say that we would complete this bill up to the title dealing with veterans. We would read that title, but not offer any amendments to it, and then adjourn for the day.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Could the gentleman state for the information of the committee whether or not the bill will be taken up for further consideration Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not know. Monday is Consent Calendar day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may state that the bill can not come up before Tuesday, under the rules.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It could be taken up Monday by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read Title VII, as follows:

TITLE VII—PARTICULAR CONSOLIDATIONS EFFECTED

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, beginning with line 12, strike out sections 701, 702, 703, and 704.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I believe that every Member of the House is actuated by a conscientious desire to economize to the fullest extent in Government expenditures. I do not believe there is one of us who would want to economize to the extent that it would place in jeopardy the lives of American citizens who travel upon the high seas and the Great Lakes and their connecting waters.

I look with some suspicion on the attempt to consolidate the Steamboat Inspection Service and the Bureau of Navigation. This, I believe, is the third or fourth attempt to consolidate these two bureaus.

The Bureau of Navigation, as I understand it, is administrative in its character. The personnel of the Steamboat Inspection Service does the actual field work of inspecting our ocean liners and lake vessels with particular reference to the safety of lives on those boats. There is no more splendid personnel than that making up the present Steamboat Inspection Service. Every man is, and of necessity must be, under civil-service regulations, a seafaring man of recognized experience. If he is to be an inspector of hulls he must have either served as a master or first-class pilot on a ship of specified tonnage before he can take the examination. If he is to be an inspector of boilers he must have served for a certain length of time as a chief engineer or an assistant engineer on a ship of recognized tonnage.

When the load line law was passed the operation of this law should properly have gone to the Steamboat Inspection Service. These men have the actual knowledge necessary to determine what the load of a vessel should be. The operation of the load line law was, however, placed under the Bureau of Navigation, with the result that this bureau contracted with the American Bureau of Shipping to do this work. It is almost a certainty that if the Steamboat Inspection Service is placed under the Bureau of Navigation the ultimate result will be the gradual reduction of force in the Steamboat Inspection Service, with its ultimate disintegration. The American Bureau of Shipping will then in all probability be called upon to do the steamboat inspection. Where is there any economy in this?

Some time ago, in 1922, to be exact, the Secretary of Commerce recommended this consolidation. His recommendation, on page 35 of his report, is as follows:

The present double system of inspection of the hulls of ocean cargo steamers should be modified because of the expense and loss of time involved in this supervision by the Government and by the private insurance agencies. The staff of officers engaged in measuring tonnage of vessels should be transferred from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce as stipulated in a bill approved by both departments and now pending.

Now, gentlemen, I hope the time will never come when you will have to put the safety of the lives of American citizens in the hands of the people and companies who write insurance on these vessels. This inspection is a Government function and responsibility and it should be maintained as such.

This is merely a movement to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to do away with the worthy and efficient services that we are giving our citizens to-day through the Steamboat Inspection Service and put it in the hands of people not qualified to pass on these matters.

The Bureau of Navigation is hiring schoolboys and teachers in the summer to do this work, and at the present time on many vessels it has been found that blocks of wood have been substituted for cork and kapok in life preservers.

Now, the insurance does not protect the lives of persons on these vessels; it reaches the cargo, but not a cent of insurance is placed by the owners on anybody that travels on the boat. The only recourse they or their estates have is against the salvage of the vessel, which they may find at the bottom of the seas or the Great Lakes.

We are for economy, but not if it must be accomplished at the sacrifice of American lives. We could better afford to lose a billion dollars than to have a recurrence of the Eastland disaster or the foundering of another Vestris. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Commerce appeared before our committee and stated that he saw no reason why these two services should not be combined. They both have to do with the safety of life and property. Both services were represented before the committee. No one who has given any thought to the provisions of this bill, no one who has read the bill, can come before the House and say that it gives the Secretary of Commerce the power to disband the Steamboat Inspection Service. I beg my friend from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] to read the language of the bill. I live much of my time on the coast line myself, and in one of the major ports of the Gulf. I know something about the duties of both of these bureaus. I know that a substantial saving may be had by their consolidation. The country is clamoring for just such consolidations as we make in this instance.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to have it specifically stated in the RECORD that it is not the intention of the Economy Committee to permit any contracts to be made by the new bureau with any private persons or corporations to perform the duties at present performed by the Steamboat Service.

Mr. McDUFFIE. There is nothing in this bill that would permit any such construction, in my opinion, with all due deference and respect for the ability of the outstanding statesman from New England.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not differing with the gentleman, but I want to have it inserted in the RECORD that the committee does not intend to do any such thing.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The committee did not intend to do it, nor will this Congress do it.

Mr. THATCHER. How much saving will there be?

Mr. McDUFFIE. It is impossible to state, accurately, what the saving will be under any consolidation. No one could know how much saving we might have by consolidating the Army and the Navy under one head of national defense, but this does effect a saving of anywhere from $100,000 to $250,000, in accordance with its administration. The gentleman, having been the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, knows himself that often by consolidating bureaus that deal with hundreds of activities, by the elimination of certain activities, and possibly of personnel, more efficient and better results may be had by the consolidation. The savings depend upon how this can be administered. There is no objection to this in the Department of Commerce, there is no objection upon the part of anybody that I have heard speak, except the gentleman from the Great Lakes section, who is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it the opinion of the chairman of the committee that this inspection service will be carried exactly as it is now with the same personnel?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Exactly as it is now, yet in the course of administration, of course, it might be found feasible to avoid duplication or have one employee do what two are now doing. However, the essentials of both services are intended to be preserved.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWING: Page 46, strike out all of section 701 after the abbreviation and figures, and insert:
"The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to transfer to the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection Service the duties and functions of the Bureau of Navigation."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of preserving whatever there is of economy in the consolidation of these two services, and yet to prevent the frittering away and destruction of the efficiency of the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection, which is the active operating efficient service on the job, I have offered this amendment to have the consolidation reversed, so that the Bureau of Navigation is transferred to the Bureau of Steamboat Service to lay the emphasis of Congress upon the fact that we do not want the efficiency of that service, which has made a splendid record and which this Congress has repeatedly refused to hamper in its activity, to be submerged in some new activity where that efficiency may be greatly impaired or destroyed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As I understand the gentleman's amendment it resolves itself into a question of which one of these bureaus you want to name first, when we put the merger into effect. They have both performed wonderful, effective service. No one criticizes that. It was the hope of the committee simply by joining these two services that the work of neither should be affected and that the work would proceed as it has always proceeded, whether it be called the Steamboat Inspection Service or the Bureau of Navigation. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon an amendment of that kind. I do not care which you name first in the language of the bill.

All we are interested in is putting them together. I can not see any excuse for changing the language of the bill. I do not think the gentleman's apprehension is well founded. The work is going on just the same.

Mr. SWING. The only purpose of my amendment is to make certain that the efficient work heretofore done by the Steamboat Inspection Service shall continue unhampered and not be submerged and commingled with something else where its efficiency will be destroyed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The Secretary of Commerce said to the committee that he saw no reason in the world why they should not be consolidated, but that he did not have the authority to do so, intimating that he might have done it himself had he that authority.

Mr. SWING. I am not opposing consolidation, but I do oppose putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Which is the horse and which is the cart?

Mr. SWING. The Steamboat Inspection Service is the horse. It is doing the vitally necessary work to-day.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Some gentlemen may think the other way.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Bureau of Navigation is the big thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 701 and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I rise, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

All this preachment of our friends across the aisle about retrenchment and consolidation is ridiculous when we watch them vote. When it comes to consolidating the Army and Navy Departments, something that would save $100,000,000, the entire Republican Party follow the distinguished retired general from Oregon. That gentleman is a fit leader for them. When a question comes up that takes away any of the perquisites of the Army or Navy, we always find some retired general or some retired admiral leading the forces back to extravagance. Every mother's son of these Republicans followed him, including the big Republican leader, but you will have to go on record on that vote when we get back in the House. That is one amendment upon which we are going to put every one of you individually on record. You will have to go down with your John Hancock in black and white. [Applause.] It does seem as though you would take some warning from what is going on in the country.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am proceeding in order. Here is a motion to strike out an economy provision, a motion made by my friend the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING]. He is the gentleman who the other day got up here and defended William Wolff Smith. [Laughter.] Just think of it! I have had 50 letters from California within the last week asking me to send them Mr. PHIL SWING's speech defending William Wolff Smith.

Mr. SWING. I have had a hundred write for it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from California had better get up here and disconnect himself from William Wolff Smith or some of those boys out in California are going to disconnect themselves from PHIL SWING. Now, Phil was talking through his hat.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. He did not know anything about William Wolff Smith when he defended him here on the floor. He just got up here and defended him on general principles. He is running for the Senate and he has to make friends, but I am the gentleman's friend, and I want him to disconnect himself from that fellow before he is harmed by it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Whose general was it who led these Members on the Democratic side of the aisle?

Mr. BLANTON. It was the Army and the Navy Club's general. It was the general of the Army and Navy Club, the biggest lobby in Washington. It is the Army and Navy Club that will not let Congress do one thing that it wants to do to effect sane economy. It sends word here, and it will have a retired general or a retired admiral here to carry out its wish every time it wants something done. Some of you know of the lobbying done here by Gen. James G. Harbord, who also draws his $6,000 retired pay as a general and his salary as the head of the Radio Corporation of America, which is said to be $50,000 per annum.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. This is not beer.

I made a speech in New York before some of the biggest business men of the city. One of the leading financiers of this Nation was toastmaster. I discussed this provision of the consolidation of the Army and Navy Departments. That was in my platform when I came to Congress. I showed what could be saved by it. The greatest applause I ever received in my life I got from that bunch of big business men in the city of New York on that proposition. They are for it because it would save $100,000,000 per annum.

You Members who have followed this retired general in striking that economy provision out of the bill to-day will hear from your constituents before we have this roll call on that elimination and before that is knocked out of this bill on final passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert a letter which Mr. JOHN J. MCSWAIN wrote on the subject of my resolution (H. J. Res. 355).

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it was contended by my colleague from California [Mr. SWING], at the time he defended William Wolff Smith, that some of the allegations of fact in my said resolution, House Joint Resolution 355, might not be correct. Let me tell him that when William Wolff Smith testified under oath before the Committee on Military Affairs, he admitted that said allegations of fact were correct. And when Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the Veterans' Administration, testified before said committee, he also admitted the allegations of fact in my said resolution were correct.

There is a preacher at Water Valley, Miss., named G. C. Schwartz, who was a chaplain, who has had himself retired upon a presumptive disability, who, without knowing anything about the facts in the resolution, has been worrying the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee with his numerous letters, in one of which he blatantly stated that it was marred by prejudice, hatred, and injustice, and that the resolution was the work of "a demagogue or a fool." He did not know a thing about the matter. But he knew that he had succeeded in getting himself retired at $125 per month on a presumptive disability, and he was dreadfully afraid that "knocking out William Wolff Smith might also knock out him," so he proceeded to denounce the resolution and to call its author "a fool or a demagogue." So to quiet him it was necessary for Chairman McSWAIN to write him and advise that General Hines, director of all veterans' affairs, had testified before the Committee on Military Affairs that the allegations in said House Joint Resolution 355 are true and correct, and he intimated to this retired chaplain that all was not well on the Potomac between him and some of the Mississippi delegation. Here is what our friend Chairman McSWAIN wrote him:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1932.

Rev. G. C. SCHWARTZ, Water Valley, Miss.

DEAR SIR: I have received your fifth communication in the last few days and I have been too busy to acknowledge receipt of the others.

If you desire to be heard before the Committee on Military Affairs, and if you will come to Washington, I am sure the committee will give you an opportunity to say anything you wish concerning H. J. Res. 355.

You say that that resolution is a scurrilous document marked by prejudice, hatred, and injustice, and is the work of a demagogue or a fool. General Hines has just finished his testimony and he has admitted that the allegations of the resolution are true. Perhaps you know more about it than General Hines, and if you do, you ought to come to Washington and tell about it. I understand that several members of the Mississippi delegation would be glad to see you up here and also Judge J. J. MANSFIELD, of Texas, wants to have an interview with you, so I am informed by a member of the Mississippi delegation.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN J. McSWAIN.

So it behooves neither my colleague from California [Mr. SWING] nor this retired chaplain from Water Valley, Miss., G. C. Schwartz, who draws his $125 per month on a presumptive disability, to ever again insinuate that the allegations in H. J. Res. 355 are not authentic, because William Wolff Smith has himself admitted they are true, and Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of Veterans' Affairs, has testified before the committee that such allegations are true, and I understand that Mr. G. C. Schwartz has all of his time taken up in Water Valley just now straightening out his own affairs.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have taken a stand in the House of Representatives against the cutting of Federal salaries, at least below $2,500 a year.

While it costs me more than my Federal salary as Congressman to carry out my congressional expenses and live, a cut in my salary or salaries of Cabinet officers and other Representatives and the higher paid officials would be far less of a hardship than cutting down those in the lower levels.

I have official information as to the number of Government employees in Fairfield County as well as the aggregate salaries received by them. This has been supplied to me by the different secretaries of the respective departments. There are approximately 1,000 Government employees receiving an aggregate salary from the Federal Government amounting to approximately $2,000,000, of which it is proposed to cut 11 per cent or take out of circulation from Fairfield County over $200,000 a year. This money is received by the employee who is paid a salary of around $1,400 or $1,500 a year.

By the tabulation furnished me by the Bureau of the Budget, I find there are in the United States 336,541 Federal employees whose salaries run between $1,000 and $2,000 a year, and 259,262 Federal employees whose salaries run between $2,000 and $2,500 a year. The average annual Federal employee's salary of the United States is $1,441.

These Federal employees may be fairly divided into three groups: One, the Army and Navy; two, strictly political appointed officeholders; and three, men and women who have availed themselves of the nonpartisan plan of civil service and are in this branch for life. This includes mostly post-office clerks, carriers, rural carriers, and some of our postmasters.

The Army and Navy can pretty well take care of themselves and do not figure in this bill. Those who have strictly political appointments take their changes and I am not worried about them; there are some drones in the service and departments that should be abolished and people working at a salary that they do not earn; the way to treat them is to abolish the departments and discharge the employees and not merely cut their salaries.

Mr. Speaker, I am more particularly interested in the third class, the civil service employees who have given up opportunities of more lucrative employment and award in other fields of work, who work on a lower grade of salary, who make it a life work, deducting pension for their old age from their pay. They are the backbone of Government work. A cut of 11 per cent or one month furlough in the salaries of these approximately 600,000 employees would involve not only them but perhaps a million or more members of their families living with or dependent upon them.

The amount of this year's huge tax need is approximately $2,000,000,000. The Economy Committee salary cut (90 per cent of which comes from people earning under $2,500 a year) would net about $60,000,000. President Hoover's plan would net about $80,000,000. Eighty million dollars is approximately 4 per cent of the total tax. I think it is a poor policy of the American Government at this time to cut down these small salaries, and for such small comparative yield in tax.

At best this depression is only a temporary one. America has never succumbed under a depression and will not at this time. It is only a question of time. We are the victims of overproduction, underconsumption, our economic distress is very largely mental. A change in heart and courage and sentiment would restore work for the seven or eight million men out of work.

We are simply overcome with a psychological condition of fear, and before we can return to normal conditions we must substitute for this fear a condition of confidence. We shall never drive out this fear by bringing about a sharp reduction in the wage of our poorly paid and hard-working Federal employees of the civil service class.

Many people feel that the evil will not be merely a cutting in the lower wages of Federal employees, but that many manufacturers and employers are looking for and will use this as an example and excuse to further reduce and bring about wage cuts in private employment.

At best we are only hitting the surface by this cutting of the small man's wages and spreading further fear and expectation of further cuts throughout several millions of our people. If the administration wishes to render a real service it might take the pattern from a service rendered to the State of New York some years ago by a well-known governor when he cut down some 90 overlapping departments to something like 14 to 17 and thereby saved the State of New York many millions. We have to-day 10 major Federal departments, over 150 bureaus, and nearly one-half that number of separate establishments, unconnected, antiquated, and outgrown through 100 years of Government, full of dry-rot, and costing the taxpayers almost enough yearly in unnecessary charges to meet our heavy tax bill this year.

Ogden Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, in his speech before the Associated Press in the Waldorf-Astoria yesterday, said that—

> The only way I know to bring adequate relief to the people of the United States is to set in motion forces that will make economic recovery possible; this means for the Government drastic economy.

Let me say to Mr. Mills and the administration that an honest, serious, and genuine attempt has not been made to correct the inefficient and uneconomic bureaucratic condition existing in Washington. The administration not only does not attempt to correct this great evil, but little, if any, aid is given to Congress by the administration in efforts to cut down the expenses. We are only hitting the surface and exasperating a large part of our population by these foolish and injurious salary cuts and lowering American standards of living by taxing the little man $100 to $200 a year. In some instances a real loss of $500 to $600, under the administration plan of enforced vacations and travel charges, would be suffered. By an increase of fear and a lowering of these standards we delay the day when prosperity will start back again.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to these salary cuts, whether they take the form of a reduction of 11 per cent or the more damaging and greater cut in the form of forced vacation and other losses recommended.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to the chairman of the committee if he will consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING]. It may sound captious, but it is not; there is a great deal more underneath this consolidation than may appear on its face. The proposed amendment, I believe, would obviate any misunderstanding later on.

The Bureau of Navigation, of course, is favored by steamship interests; but the Steamship Inspection Service, although functioning under antiquated laws and limited appropriations, is rendering splendid service. Countless lives are saved yearly by the good work of this service. The greed of shipowners under obsolete laws limiting their liability must be curbed by an efficient, honest inspection service.

I refer to a statement which I made on December 14, 1928, which is on page 622 of the bound RECORD; I there reviewed the history of our navigation laws. I urged at the time the necessity of bringing our laws up to date and increasing the inspection service. If the House will remember the Vestris disaster four years ago, it will bring home the necessity of such inspection. If we are to submerge the Steamboat Inspection Service in that of the Bureau of Navigation, I am so fearful that the tremendous influences of the steamship interests will destroy this very useful service——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman is always fearful of some hidden sinister interest.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. That has been my experience.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I wish the gentleman, when he makes such charges, would call names and be fair to the House and say who is crooked and who is straight.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a fair statement. I will be glad to answer that, if time permits.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But I want the gentleman to point out in this bill, if he will, for the benefit of the House, where one of these services is submerged in another.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill provides that the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection is merged with that of the Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The bill reads "consolidated and coordinated," in the very first paragraph.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, the gentleman must understand that the very nature and the very purpose of the two bureaus are such that the Steamboat Inspection must remain unimpaired and uninfluenced and unhampered by that of the Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I make the statement that the committee—I will repeat it, I have said it once, and I probably have said it twice—that the commission had no thought of impairing the wonderfully effective service of the Steamboat Inspection Bureau. We do not expect it to be done. We think the country would frown on it if it should be done, and we do not think any Secretary of Commerce would be so unwise as to do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman's statement is very helpful in developing the intent of Congress. If we did nothing else, I am sure that this discussion bringing forth that statement is very helpful. It establishes the intent of Congress.

The gentleman from Alabama says I am always seeing something sinister. I did not see anything sinister when I voted with the gentleman on the consolidation of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is not the question here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In this instance I know, and so does the gentleman from Alabama who is familiar with maritime conditions, that the owners of ships are always resisting inspection under this service. They do not like it; and when we tried to modify the law after the Vestris disaster it was resisted. Anyone who is familiar with our navigation laws must know that they are antiquated, that they are obsolete, and we ought to bring them up to date.

We have been trying for 14 years to do it, but have been unable to do so. The steamship interests prevent it. I shall continue my efforts to have our navigation laws and our maritime laws revised and brought up to date. The law on hull inspection must be revised. Stability tests at regular intervals must be made compulsory. The personnel of the Steamboat Inspection Service increased. Above all things, I repeat, the work of the service must not be permitted to be hampered or curtailed in any manner. If, notwithstanding the assurance given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], we find that it is, I guarantee the House right now that it will be brought to their attention again. I shall continue my efforts to repeal the law which limits the liability of ship owners—a law which permits them to pocket insurance money for the loss of a ship and permits them to plead the limitation of liability and refuse to pay for loss of life. Gentlemen, that is the law to-day—a law several hundred years old. This consolidated service will surely be kept under vigilant observation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: On page 48, line 21, strike out section 705.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, not in behalf of any official or any employee of the Government, because not a single employee or official of the Government can possibly be affected by the provisions of section 705. Neither can $100 a year be saved by it. I oppose the section solely in the interest of efficacy in administration of civil-service affairs, and in having effective checks in order to prevent, by perversion of existing law, undue increases in salary. Therefore, I rest my objection to this section on a basis of sound economy.

The Personnel Classification Board is comprised of the Chief of the Budget Bureau as chairman, the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, and a member of the Civil Service Commission. When the classification act of 1924 was adopted, the functions to be performed by the Personnel Classification Board were of such importance and depended so much upon the integrity and the intelligence of the administration of this personnel classification that no one official was intrusted with it, but the Budget Bureau, the Bureau of Efficiency, and the Civil Service Commission were each given authority, one to check the other in the performance of these duties.

At first the Efficiency Board did not function as it was intended and was subject to severe and just cricitism, but that is not the condition at the present time. The members of the board draw no salary. Their functions are dealing with policy. The actual work under the policy laid down by the Classification Board and under its supervision is performed by a skeleton organization which is eked out by detail of employees from time to time from the various departments of the Government.

Now, it takes many, many more men to do the classification work than are on the pay roll of the Classification Board, and that work is done by detailed employees who draw no money. Therefore the result of this section would be simply to transfer bodily the working force of the Classification Board to the Civil Service Commission, and I doubt whether authority exists for detailing from departments in the city of Washington employees to work in the Civil Service Commission. So the Civil Service Commission would have to increase its personnel, and this section would thus increase the Government expense.

The main objection I have is that the Civil Service Commission may, if it sees fit, by an interpretation of its functions and by exercising certain functions which they may claim the law gives them, unduly increase the general level of salaries throughout the service. For that reason, sitting side by side with the representative of the Civil Service Commission is the Director of the Budget to protect the Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it matters not what consolidation of Government agencies is suggested, immediately following the introduction of a bill propaganda starts. It comes from sources that do not understand the situation but simply protest because some job or jobs might be affected. The personnel affected naturally is disturbed, but that situation will always exist when consolidations are brought about. It seems to me there is opportunity for vast savings if the two agencies mentioned in this paragraph are placed under one roof. The Classification Board will, I think, function with a higher degree of efficiency. Records, many of which are duplications, will be placed together. Both agencies will find their work curtailed during the next year. The bill provides for the suspension of promotions and increases in salaries. That slows up the work of the Classification Board. No appointments are to be made, so that means no civil-service examinations and no certifications can be made unless authorized by the President, so the Civil Service Commission will find itself without work. There are other agencies that should have been placed in this set-up, but the Economy Committee would not agree with my suggestion along this line.

The Committee on Expenditures considered a bill to merge the personnel activities of the Government and reported it favorably. It was suggested that the Civil Service Commission, the Personnel Classification Board, the retirement division of the Veterans' Administration, the Bureau of Efficiency, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, all having to do with personnel, be placed under one head. Objection was immediately made to the inclusion of the United States Compensation Commission because that commission administers the longshoremen's act and also the District of Columbia liability act. The question of including the Employees' Compensation Commission is, I admit, debatable, but I favored including that in the bill and leaving it for the House to decide. It was in the bill when it was reported by the Expenditures Committee. I looked for strong opposition if that bill had been called up, but I said I favored the House speaking on the question. If the House wanted to eliminate it I would have been satisfied.

The gentleman from New Jersey speaks of the Personnel Classification Board. Less than a year ago the President issued an order to discontinue promotions on account of the condition of the Treasury. Then, instead of promoting an employee, they put him in another grade. An appeal to the Classification Board was made, and the hearings before the independent offices subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations will show that the Classification Board practically raised the salaries of employees to the extent of several hundred thousand dollars after the President's order has been issued.

The Classification Board to-day is doing another job. It is making surveys, reclassifying the employees of the Government, and seeing if it can not place those doing the same class of work into a different grade—that is, a lower grade. The Classification Board must confine itself to this work during the next year. There will be a general shake-up in personnel and many to hold a position will accept a reduction and therefore must be reclassified.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does not this bill already authorize the President to make this consolidation if, after investigation and consideration, he deems it wise?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It probably does; but it is a question as to whether or not he will have to come to Congress to do what we ask you to do here. There will be a saving here. Not so much, but a saving. It is my hope that the President will even go farther than the Congress is going.

I believe if there is one thing in this bill that is going to be beneficial to this country, if it is administered properly, it is the power which you place in the President to reorganize Government agencies, because unless you give the President that power it will never be done. [Applause.] Congress has tried for 20 years to do it and failed.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why not leave it to him, then?

Mr. TREADWAY. Why pick on one particular board, known as the Classification Board, and insist that the consolidation be made?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Because the hearings developed a need for this, and the President in a message suggested that Congress consolidate the personnel activities. We were ready. It means a saving, so why not do it by law now?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Under the authority granted in Title IV of the amendment the President has no authority to consolidate or to merge an agency created by statute, and the Personnel Classification Board was created by statute.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is just what I indicated in my reply to the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this particular agency of the Government has already come under the consideration of the committees of Congress with a view to economy; that the appropriation has been reduced from $200,000 to $150,000, or by 25 per cent. If the same economies were realized generally in the Budget, $1,000,000,000 would be lopped off of the charges against the Government in the coming year.

I have looked at the report of the committee in this matter, and without making the statement in any purpose to criticize, I find no explanation or supporting statement whatever for this change of a statute, a statute that must have been enacted after that degree of attention which is usually given these matters by the committees of the House. In the absence of any evidence that further desirable economy can be accomplished by abolishing this particular agency or shifting it to some other function in the administrative part of the Government, I myself will feel constrained to vote against its adoption.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. I did not intend to speak, but I happen to be a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Our chairman spoke in behalf of abolishing the Classification Board and called the attention of the committee to the fact that his committee had reported out a bill, which is on the calendar, providing for its consolidation with the Civil Service Commission. That is true, but several of the members of the Expenditures Committee filed dissenting opinions.

The chairman of the Expenditures Committee did not advise you that a majority of the Expenditures Committee, when they recommended the consolidation of the Classification Board with the United States Civil Service Commission, also recommended that the consolidation include the United States Employees' Compensation Commission. Upon careful reflection the members of the Economy Committee, including the chairman of the Expenditures Committee, I believe, reached the decision that the small majority of the Expenditures Committee erred in asking for the consolidation of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission; in fact, they admit it, because they know it is impossible, either in the name of efficiency or economy or in compliance with a sound fundamental public policy, to consolidate these agencies.

The Civil Service Commission appeared before the Committee on Expenditures; they wanted the entire consolidation. They wanted to swallow the United States Employees' Compensation Commission and they wanted to swallow the Classification Board. Why? Because they know that by reason of the fact that Government employees are not resigning in great numbers and also because they have large eligible lists now, in the name of economy, they could remove about one-half of the employees from the Civil Service Commission rolls. They want to consolidate and swallow these other agencies and keep many of their own employees whose services are not needed now and cut off the Government pay roll the employees of these other agencies.

As the former chairman of the Civil Service Committee indicated, it is sound from the economy standpoint and from the efficiency standpoint to have a check upon the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission has its functions and the functions of that commission are not similar to the functions of the Classification Board, which is an appellate body. The functions of the Civil Service Commission are not related to the functions of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, whose functions are of a judicial nature. All the great labor organizations in this country are opposed to consolidating the United States Employees' Compensation Commission with the Civil Service Commission. If the chairman of the Expenditures Committee is going to use the report of the Expenditures Committee as an argument in favor of consolidating the Classification Board with the Civil Service Commission, why then did he not explain to the House the failure of the Economy Committee to report the proposition in its entirety as recommended by the Committee on Expenditures, of which he is chairman?

Why did not the gentleman and the Economy Committee recommend the entire bill, as they did in the case of the provision with respect to the Public Works Administration, if the action of the Expenditures Committee is suggested as a reason to consolidate the Classification Board?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman might also state that originally this board was part of the Civil Service Commission, but it did not work out.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It did not work out, and that is why the Classification Board is now an independent agency. Its duties are different, and because of economy and efficiency we had to have a separate agency, and yet the Economy Committee includes its consolidation in the bill, and in their committee report they do not indicate one word or give one reason why this unusual action should be taken or how it will save one penny. There are only three lines in the committee report with reference to their recommendation on this consolidation.

I hope the amendment will be adopted in the name of efficiency and in the name of economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 30, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on Title VII and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 49, at the end of line 2, add the following: "That the rates of compensation for positions to which, prior to the effective date of this act the provisions of the classification act of 1923, as amended (U. S. C., Title V, ch. 13) applied, shall be the rates in force on the day preceding the effective date of the classification act of 1923 for positions involving the same or substantially similar duties."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he can recognize the gentleman except by unanimous consent. All debate on section 705 and all amendments thereto was closed some time ago by order of the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes, because I was also under a misapprehension about the time.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall only ask for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If the request is granted the gentleman from Texas, the Chair would suggest that the same amount of time be granted the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, for what purpose does the gentleman from Maine desire to address the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has an amendment to offer and wishes to speak on his amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. For the information of the Chair and the committee, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will probably be offered as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the request, as I understand it, is that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to speak three minutes on the amendment he has offered. I shall not object provided there is coupled with that request the additional request that there be an equal amount of time granted to anyone who wishes to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is afraid the gentleman from Arizona does not quite understand the situation. Under the motion of the gentleman from Arizona, which was agreed to, all debate on this title and all amendments thereto was ordered closed in 10 minutes. Prior to that all debate had been closed on section 705. The gentleman from Texas now offers an amendment to section 705. Of course, the amendment is in order, but the Chair holds that he will have to ask unanimous consent to address the committee on that particular section, and the time occupied, of course, would be included in the 10 minutes now remaining.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The Chair is quite correct in his statement of the matter. The unanimous-consent request was made, and the gentleman from Arizona rose and reserved the right to object and stated he would not object provided three minutes were given to one opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, let me make a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be allowed to proceed for 3 minutes, and the gentleman from Arizona be allowed 3 minutes to reply, the 6 minutes to be taken out of the 10 minutes' debate.

Mr. McCORMACK. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to explain my amendment to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 4, strike out paragraph (c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Such of the officers and employees of the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce and the Federal Radio Commission as, in the judgment of the President, are indispensable to the efficient operation of the consolidated bureau shall be retained under the consolidation, and all other officers and employees affected by such consolidation shall be dismissed."

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken any time in the discussion of this pending bill. If this amendment serves to carry out and make more effective the purpose of the committee, I shall not take any time, unless some Member present desires an explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Under the language of the committee, only those employees of the Radio Division will be subject to dismissal. That would be an injustice to others who may have served longer than those who under the language are subject to discharge. The language of the gentleman from Maine places them all on an equal basis, equal footing.

Mr. BEEDY. Exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman why you use the term "bureau" instead of "commission"?

Mr. BEEDY. I consulted the legislative draftsman, and we thought it would be best to use that language. It can be corrected in the Senate.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know who is responsible for this language, but I think it is a reflection on the American people to write into substantive law the language embodied in this provision. I think it is a reflection on the intelligence of the American people to incorporate in this bill an implication that any officer or employee of the present Radio Commission is indispensable to the efficient administration of the commission. Certainly no man or set of men now connected with the Radio Commission has a monopoly on the radio science to such an extent that his services are indispensable. We are not so poverty stricken in ability and scientific attainments of our people as to require Congress to write into substantive law language which implies that the radio science would go to the "demnition bowwows" if some of the present officers or employees of the Radio Commission should be separated from the service.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield me 30 seconds of my own time, I will say to him that I adopted that word because it was in the act. It was put in there by the legislative draftsman. If that is an objectionable word and the gentleman from Missouri has a better one, as far as I am concerned I will accept his.

Mr. LOZIER. I am not criticizing my friend from Maine, but I am complaining of the practice of Congress in anchoring members of boards and commissions to their jobs by using language in bills which implies that a few swivel-chair administrators have a corner on efficiency and capacity for the proper discharge of the public business. Why, gentlemen, you could discharge every man connected with the Radio Commission and replace them with men selected at random from any one of a thousand communities without impairing the efficiency of the commission one iota.

This bill justifies the implication that certain officers and employees of the Radio Commission are indispensable to its efficient operation.

Mr. BEEDY. I do not think there was any such intention upon the part of those writing the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This provision in this bill with regard to the Classification Board and the ratings it has been making and the committee's action in proposing to abolish the board should have been amended so as to abolish the inexcusably high salaries now being paid. It should have provided that all of these unreasonably high salaries that wrongfully and unjustly have been established be stopped, and the action of the board granting them repealed, and the men who draw them put back on their former basis, so that Congress may regain control of the fixing of salaries. I proposed an amendment here that would have done that very thing. But our Republican brethren defeated it. The other day I put in the RECORD a list of a bunch of the employees who, when this act was passed by our friend from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], drew small salaries, but who now draw $5,000, $7,000, $8,000, and $9,000 a year because they have been rated by this board—with no reason for it at all. Look at pages 8248, 8249, 8250, and 8251 of the RECORD for April 14, 1932, and you will see some of these salaries. Hundreds of them were raised overnight by this board from $1,800, $2,000, and $3,000 to $5,000, $6,000, $7,000, $8,000, and $9,000. My amendment would have stopped it. I sought to correct that. Yet the so-called economy advocate from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], our friend who preaches economy so much but never votes for it——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The man who is always wanting it but who, when the time comes to get it, goes with the other bunch; he had to be the one to prevent my discussing my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not discussing the question before the committee but is discussing me.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. When I proposed this amendment it seemed that everybody wanting sane economy and desiring retrenchment ought to be in favor of it, and yet the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS] refused to let me have even one minute.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman from Texas is not discussing the amendment but is discussing me.

The CHAIRMAN. It is quite evident that the gentleman from Texas was discussing the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. BLANTON. I was diverted by reason of the gentleman keeping me from speaking for one minute on an economy proposition. I presumed, Mr. Chairman, that when I was proposing to stop $1,800 clerks from drawing $8,000 and $9,000 salaries that I would surely have the aid of my friend from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON], but he objected to my having one minute, hence these three gentlemen are responsible for these $1,800 clerks still getting their $8,000 and $9,000 salaries.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am wondering why the gentleman insists on discussing a case after it is out of court. He did not allow attorneys in his court to do any such thing.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to pin down the responsibility for my amendment not being adopted to the men who kept it from being adopted. There must be some responsibility fixed here in the House when a Member offers a good amendment and it is not adopted. My amendment would have stopped these $1,800 men from drawing $9,000. There is some reason why it did not prevail, and the three men who stood on the floor and kept it from being passed were my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD; my friend from Connecticut, Mr. GOSS; and my friend from South Dakota, Mr. WILLIAMSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that all debate is exhausted on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the order of the committee. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has studied the radio problem more than any other member here, I think. I ask unanimous consent that he have five minutes in which to discuss this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy extended by my colleagues.

I am heartily in favor of the transfer of the Radio Division to the Federal Radio Commission. In fact, in the last Congress the Senate, as I understand, unanimously passed a resolution to that effect, and the House committee unanimously reported the resolution, although it never came up for action in the House. The reason it was not permitted to be considered by the House was because of propaganda that was carried on by certain parties who were wanting to make secure their jobs. A similar resolution has passed the Senate this session. The omnibus radio bill which passed the House has been amended in the Senate so as to provide for this transfer.

I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] ought to be adopted, because I think it is entirely too broad. The only function performed by the Radio Division is an inspection service, and as it stands now they are hanging in midair without being under the responsibility of the commission or anybody else that has anything to do with the regulation of radio. This Radio Division should be under the direction of the commission, which is authorized by Congress to perform all of these regulatory functions.

As I say, the Radio Division does not contain any officials who are conflicting with any of the officials of the Federal Radio Commission. There are no officials whatever except inspectors. I think they have about 40 inspectors—doubtless too many—and then there is an office force in addition to that. It is estimated that this transfer will effect a saving of at least $120,000. It will promote efficiency and cooperation.

As the Federal Radio Commission under the law is made responsible for the proper regulation and supervision of radio, I think the authority should rest with them and the obligation be imposed upon them to select the officials who shall perform that service.

I am in thorough accord with the idea that all of the officials and employees shall be dispensed with in so far as possible. The President is authorized to do that under the language of the bill before us, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, if you will read it carefully, is so very far-reaching as to authorize the discharge of any of the officials in either the Federal Radio Commission or the Radio Division.

With respect to the matter of expense, the omnibus radio bill which passed the House and which is now pending in the Senate has been reported favorably to the Senate with a provision imposing radio licenses and fees which will practically cause the radio industry to pay the cost of Federal regulation and supervision. I am heartily in favor of that. As that is to be done I do not think it should be hampered as indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BEEDY) there were ayes 38 and noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEOD: Page 52, after line 9, insert a new Title VII–A, as follows:

"Nothwithstanding the provisions of section 204, the President is authorized to retain in the civil service beyond the retirement age civil-service employees whose separation from the service would in his opinion not be in the public interest."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks the amendment offered as a new title is clearly not germane. It would have been germane had it been offered to Title II. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute for the purpose of explaining what is in this amendment, as I shall later ask unanimous consent to refer back to Title II, page 9, to insert this section. I do not believe the Members appreciate what has been done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I do not object, I think the gentleman ought to have a right to speak for one minute. I think all gentlemen should have a right to speak for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE VIII—INTERDEPARTMENTAL WORK

SEC. 801. Section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved May 21, 1920 (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 686), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a) Any executive department or independent establishment of the Government, or any bureau or office thereof, if funds are available therefor and if it is determined by the head of such executive department, establishment, bureau, or office to be in the interest of the Government so to do, may place orders with any other such department, establishment, bureau, or office for materials, supplies, equipment, work, or services, of any kind that such requisitioned Federal agency may be in a position to supply or equipped to render, and shall pay promptly by check to such Federal agency as may be requisitioned, upon its written request, either in advance or upon the furnishing or performance thereof, all or part of the estimated or actual cost thereof as determined by such department, establishment, bureau, or office as may be requisitioned; but proper adjustments on the basis of the actual cost of the materials, supplies, or equipment furnished, or work or services performed, paid for in advance, shall be made as may be agreed upon by the departments, establishments, bureaus, or offices concerned. Bills rendered or requests for advance payments made pursuant to any such order shall not be subject to audit or certification in advance of payment.

"(b) Amounts paid as provided in subsection (a) shall be credited, (1) in the case of advance payments, to special working funds, or (2) in the case of payments other than advance payments, to the appropriations or funds against which charges have been made pursuant to any such order, except as hereinafter provided. The Secretary of the Treasury shall establish such special working funds as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this subsection. Such amounts paid shall be available for expenditure in furnishing the materials, supplies, or equipment, or in performing the work or services, or for the objects specified in such appropriations or funds. Where materials, supplies, or equipment are furnished from stocks on hand, the amounts received in payment therefor shall be credited to appropriations or funds, as may be authorized by other law, or, if not so authorized, so as to be available to replace the materials, supplies, or equipment, except that where the head of any such department, establishment, bureau, or office determines that such replacement is not necessary the amounts paid shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"(c) Orders placed as provided in subsection (a) shall be considered as obligations upon appropriations in the same manner as orders or contracts placed with private contractors. Advance payments credited to a special working fund shall remain available until expended."

SEC. 802. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of this title, such section 7, as in force prior to the date of the enactment of this act, shall remain in force with respect to the disposition of funds transferred thereunder prior to such date.

(b) Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize any Government department or independent establishment, or any bureau or office thereof, to place any orders for material, supplies, equipment, work, or services to be furnished or performed by convict labor, except as otherwise provided by existing law.

(c) The provisions of this title are in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of any other law relating to working funds.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Economy Committee what change this title makes in existing law, particularly the amendment of section 7 of the act making appropriation for fortifications and other works of defense.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BRIGGS. What change does this Title VIII, particularly the amendment of section 7 of the so-called fortification act, make in existing law?

Mr. FRENCH. The essential provisions in the new language carry the idea of the law that has been on the books for 10 or 12 years into application as to all departments and bureaus of the Government, and permits one bureau or department to do work for another when it had facilities and the requesting bureau was without them.

I would say to the gentleman that the matter came to the attention of the Subcommittee on Appropriations handling the Navy Department appropriation in connection with hearings, where we found that the Navy Department was hampered when it undertook to do certain work for certain bureaus and departments of the Government, chiefly in the matter of not having funds with which to finance the work itself, and inability to arrange for the other department to transfer funds. To correct the situation in part we carried upon an appropriation bill a few years ago an authorization under which the Navy Department could set up a fund that should be known as a working fund for the purpose of handling work for other bureaus and departments of the Government. It worked well. It meant economies, and the fund would be used as a working fund to begin a job, and then moneys would be transferred from other bureaus or departments to this fund to replace the funds advanced.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is this an interchangeable fund? I mean is it a fund which is built up and available to some other department of the Government without being charged to the other department of the Government that is utilizing it, or not?

Mr. FRENCH. No; on the contrary, the money is chargeable to the department that received the appropriation from Congress; but it might call upon another department that has facilities to do the work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman a question, with the permission of the gentleman from Texas?

The thing I am interested in most in reference to this section is whether or not the effect of this section would put the Government any farther into any kind of business than it already is with reference to these various departments.

Mr. FRENCH. It would permit one department that is doing a particular line of work, and is qualified to do that work, to do the work upon the request of another department and upon an agreement between the two departments to do that specific work. For instance, the Navy Department has navy yards. The Interior Department has no navy yards, but has one or two craft like the Boxer. The Boxer is used in connection with the work of the Indian Service in Alaskan waters, and under language carried in the appropriation a few years ago it was permitted to be overhauled for the Interior Department in one of the Government navy yards.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman further if, under the language of this bill, we have sufficiently provided that contracts may be let to private interests in the event those interests can do the work more cheaply than either of the departments can do it?

Mr. FRENCH. I think the whole matter is left to the discretion of the two departments involved as to whether or not the departments will avail themselves of the authority here granted.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But does not the gentleman think we ought to carry the same provision we have always carried on our appropriation bills, both for the building of ships, naval ships and others, that would give private interests an opportunity to do the work if they can do it as cheaply or more cheaply than the Federal Government?

Mr. FRENCH. I have no objection to the language carried heretofore.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the time, for I am getting some real information. I want to ask the gentleman from Idaho this question: In the discussion we had over the consolidation provisions of the Army and Navy it was brought out that there were separate plants maintained by both the Army and Navy for the manufacture of clothing for the use of those services. Does this provision of the bill permit utilization of only one of those plants or factories without the utilization of both of them in the manufacture of clothing and enable the Government thereby to save substantial sums?

Mr. FRENCH. I should think that it would be possible to do just that thing under the language here.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman know whether it has ever been utilized for that purpose?

Mr. FRENCH. No; because for many years the different services have had establishments of their own.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not possible, through the Appropriations Committee itself and by the regulation of appropriations, to force that sort of economy?

Mr. FRENCH. It would be possible; yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The question in my mind is why it is not done, why the Army and Navy maintain two establishments for making clothing when one would do? This presents quite a different question from that involving the consolidation of the Army and the Navy into one unit for national defense. It seems to me, if this provision is capable of being utilized to promote savings and economies, it ought to be adopted; and such savings and economies ought to be encouraged as far as possible by action of the Appropriations Committee in denying any duplication of service.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the gentleman is correct; and may I say that the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee have recognized from year to year that proposition, but on account of the fact that committees during the last 10 or 12 years did not initiate the projects, but rather found shops and plants in operation by different departments, with investments made by the Government, we could not effect the economies that would have seemed possible many times because of investments already made.

Mr. BRIGGS. This is an economy program; and when it comes down to fundamentals I think that everybody wants to have carried into effect throughout this Government the utmost economies of every kind which can be effected properly and still let the Government be carried on efficiently. Does not the Appropriations Committee think that with this support they can effect still further economies in the appropriations?

Mr. FRENCH. It is my judgment that it would be possible; yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. And they will pursue that course?

Mr. FRENCH. I should hope so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the pending title should have some safeguarding provision. The ultimate purpose may be worthy, but I think it is not the intention of the committee or of the House to favor every Government utility being utilized to its maximum extent. Under this phraseology the departments would be relieved from calling upon private industry to meet the requirements of the Government. If, perchance, there was any activity in the governmental service, it would be forced to call upon that governmental activity for the performance of that work and not upon private contractors. I understand the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] has an amendment which will not prevent the Government from calling upon private industry to compete in Government work if, perchance, there happens to be any utility in the departmental service that can perform the work. It is not the intention of the Government to go into all kinds of work and to deprive private industry of work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from South Dakota and myself have just completed an amendment which we think will take care of that objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from South Dakota read his amendment for the information of the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I will read the amendment:

Provided, however, That if such work or services can be as conveniently or more cheaply performed by private agencies, such work shall be let by competitive bids to such private agencies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does the gentleman propose to offer that amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. At page 53, after the word "payment," in line 12.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: On page 53, after the word "payment" in line 12, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, however, That if such work or services can be as conveniently or more cheaply performed by private agencies, such work shall be let by competitive bids to such private agencies."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That the Government department or any employees thereof would not be kept idle by so doing.

Otherwise you have no saving at all. The whole point is that if we have a Government department to do the work and we let out that work, even though it may be done slightly cheaper, and the employees of that Government department sit there idle, there will be no saving.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I will say that as far as this interdepartmental work is concerned, the only purpose of it is to expedite Government work and permit it to be done by the agency best equipped. For illustration, several departments outside the Navy have vessels. Under this title they may go into a navy yard and have repair work done there. The Navy Department has very fine inspection service. Other departments use this inspection service for the inspection of materials and supplies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the amendment is too rigid, because if it only provides for economy we can only take into consideration the cost of that one job and overlook the cost of the overhead of that department.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I will not press my amendment, because it is involved; but, I submit, gentlemen, there will be no economy here at all.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not the gentleman think that instead of using the words "more cheaply" we should use the words "more conveniently and effectively"? That would cover everything.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The amendment reads "conveniently or more cheaply."

Mr. McCORMACK. But would not the word "effectively" cover everything that the gentleman seeks to do?

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will yield, I think the whole idea, as far as the gentleman from South Dakota and myself are concerned, was not to tie up all of this work so that the taxpayers with shipyards would have it all, but that some of those people who might be idle would have an opportunity to do some of the work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was my point this morning in connection with the use of Army and Navy officers on public works.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But the gentleman now proposes to destroy the effect of this amendment by the words he wishes to add to the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman thinks my amendment would do that?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think so, absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the proviso I have offered should follow the word "concerned," in line 10, page 53.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, may I make this suggestion? We have carried in various appropriation bills where money has been appropriated for the doing of work, sometimes within establishments under the Government and sometimes by contract, language something like the language proposed in the amendment; but, as I recall the language, it usually has had a safeguarding clause to the effect that this could be done when the interests of the Government would not be disturbed. It seems to me that if we could let this language lie over we would have time to examine the language in acts where it has worked effectively in doing what the gentleman wants to do. I am agreeable to doing what the gentleman has in mind; but this language might have the effect of compelling the Government or some bureau to do work by contract and letting an agency of the Government stand idle, as the gentleman from New York has suggested, because it would be possible to have the work done by contract somewhat cheaper on a particular job than to have it done, for instance, in the Brooklyn Navy Yard or some other Government institution, although Government interests and convenience would be served by the latter course.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But the gentleman is overlooking some other workers who are not fortunate enough to be on the pay roll of the Government, but are in private shipyards, and there are a number of them walking the streets. They have added much to the long line of unemployment in this country.

Mr. FRENCH. I think, perhaps, the amendment goes too far.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the amendment gives the men to whom I have referred an opportunity to do some of this work, certainly the gentleman does not want to deny it to them.

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all; but I think the amendment probably goes a little too far, and that the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is correct. It might be construed so rigidly as to tie up a navy yard or tie up an activity that could reasonably do the work, and ought to do the work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But if we say, "If it can be as conveniently" that covers a lot of territory and if we add "more cheaply" that is going a long way.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Perhaps we should add the words "as expeditiously" to the words "more cheaply."

Mr. McDUFFIE. That would be a matter of discretion with the head of the department.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman object to a unanimous-consent request that we may return to this matter at the next session of the committee for the consideration of this bill and then perfect this language?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not want to get in the habit of turning back, if I can prevent it. I am having enough of a struggle to go forward, but in view of the difference of opinion about this item, I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. FRENCH. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment be considered as pending upon the reconvening of the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE. With the understanding, if the gentleman please, that it is the only thing under this title that can be considered when we return to it.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, for this afternoon I move that all debate on this title and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair put the unanimous-consent request?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not, because this is a preferential motion. The Chair will later put the request.

The gentleman from Arizona moves that all debate on this title and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks unanimous consent that when the House again goes into Committee of the Whole that permission be given to return to this title for this one amendment only.

Mr. FRENCH. And any amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. And any amendments thereto.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I dislike to object—but when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] made a similar request a short while ago, it was objected to.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the gentleman will be quite interested in the point of view I am pointing out, if I understand the district the gentleman represents.

Mr. CONNERY. In fairness to the gentleman from Michigan, who was refused a similar request, I feel constrained to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 52, noes 18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Title IX.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IX.—PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO VETERANS

GENERAL ADJUSTMENT OF VETERANS' BENEFITS

SEC. 901. Notwithstanding the provisions of law in effect at the date of enactment of this act, except as to those persons who have attained the age of 65 years, or those persons who served in the active military or naval forces and who actually suffered an injury or contracted a disease in line of duty as a result of and directly attributable to such service, or those persons who, in accordance with the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, or the laws granting military or naval pensions, are temporarily totally disabled or permanently and totally disabled as a result of disease or injury acquired in, or aggravated by, active military or naval service, or those persons who while in the active military or naval service engaged in actual combat with, were under actual fire of, or served in the zone of active hostilities against, the armed forces of the enemy in any war in which the United States was engaged, no allowance, compensation, retired pay, pension, hospitalization, or domiciliary care under the war risk insurance act, as amended, the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, the laws governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions, the laws governing the granting of domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration, or the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, shall be payable or granted to any person whose net income as defined by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, was $1,500 or over, if single, and $3,500 or over, if married, for the year preceding the enactment of this act or the year preceding the filing of application for benefits, whichever is the later. The minimum amounts above specified shall be increased by $400 for each person dependent upon the applicant during the period prescribed. Such benefits shall not be paid or granted during any year following that in which the net income plus allowance for dependents exceeds the prescribed amounts: Provided, That irrespective of the income for a preceding year, upon submission of proof satisfactory to the administrator of reduction in income during the current year below the amounts specified herein, when prorated monthly, such benefits as may otherwise be authorized shall be allowable from the date of administrative determination. Payments of Government insurance, allowance, compensation, retired pay, or pension shall not be considered as income within the provisions of this section. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, upon request, to transmit to the administrator a certificate containing the information required by the administrator to carry out the purposes of this section affecting each person who is applying for or receiving such allowance, compensation, retired pay, pension, hospitalization, or domiciliary care, and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the facts stated therein. As to allowance, compensation, retired pay, or pension being paid, or hospitalization or domiciliary care being furnished, at the date of enactment of this act, this section shall take effect six months after such date, and no continuance or granting of allowance, compensation, retired pay, pension, hospitalization, or domiciliary care shall thereafter be authorized except in accordance herewith. As to pending claims and claims filed after the date of enactment of this act, the provisions of this section shall take effect on such date: Provided, That this section shall not apply to such persons as are entitled to benefits described in this section on account of the death of any person who served in the active military or naval service.

VETERANS IN INSTITUTIONS

SEC. 902. The first two paragraphs of subdivision (7) of section 202 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, sec. 480), are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Effective as of the first day of the third calendar month following the month during which this amendatory act is enacted, where any person shall have been maintained as an inmate of the United States Soldiers' Home, or of any national or State soldiers' home, or of St. Elizabeths Hospital, or maintained by the Veterans' Administration in an institution or institutions, for a period of 30 days or more, the compensation, pension, allowance, or retired pay under the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, shall thereafter not exceed $20 per month so long as he shall thereafter be maintained: Provided, That if such person has a wife, a child or children, or dependent parent or parents, the difference between the $20 and the amount to which the veteran would otherwise be entitled except for the provisions of this subdivision may be paid to the wife, child or children, and dependent parent or parents in accordance with regulations prescribed by the administrator.

"All or any part of such compensation, pension, allowance, or retired pay under the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, of any mentally incompetent inmate of such institution may, in the discretion of the administrator, be paid to the chief officer of said institution to be properly accounted for and to be used for the benefit of such inmate: Provided, however, That in any case where the estate of such mentally incompetent veteran without dependents, derived from funds paid under the war risk insurance act, as amended, the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, the laws governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions, or the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, equals or exceeds $3,000, payment of compensation, pension, allowance, or retired pay shall be discontinued until the estate is reduced to $3,000, and this proviso shall apply to payments due or accruing prior or subsequent to the date of enactment of this amendatory act: Provided further, That if such person shall be discharged from such institution as competent, such sum shall be paid as is held in trust for him by the United States or any chief officer of an institution as a result of the laws in effect prior and/or subsequent to the enactment of this amendatory act: Provided further, That if in the judgment of the administrator a mentally incompetent person without dependents, receiving compensation, pension, allowance, or retired pay under the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, requires institutional care for his mental condition and his guardian or other person charged with his custody refuses to accept or permit the continuance of the institutional care offered or approved by the administrator, compensation, pension, allowance, or retired pay under the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, payable, shall not exceed $20 per month so long as the need for such institutional care shall continue. The administrator in his discretion, upon showing of proper treatment in a recognized reputable private institution may waive the reduction provided by this subdivision."

EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIRED PAY

SEC. 903. (a) In the administration of the act of May 24, 1928, entitled "An act making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War" (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, secs. 581 and 582), no officer or former officer shall receive retired pay thereunder, unless he served as a member of the Military or Naval Establishment between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, inclusive, and within such period actually contracted a disease or suffered an injury in line of duty as the result of and directly attributable to such service, or unless he served a period of 90 days or more between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, inclusive, and actually contracted a disease or suffered an injury in line of duty as the result of and directly attributable to service between November 12, 1918, and July 2, 1921, inclusive, and unless he has been or is found by the former Veterans' Bureau or the Veterans' Administration to be not less than 30 per cent permanently disabled as a result thereof prior to May 24, 1928, or within one year thereafter, in accordance with the rating schedule and amendments promulgated pursuant to subdivision (4) of section 202 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 477), in force at that time, and unless he is found by the Veterans' Administration to be not less than 30 per cent permanently disabled at the time of the enactment of this act under such rating schedule as amended and in effect at the date of the enactment of this act: Provided, That no person shall be retired without pay except in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this section, except that the degree of disability required for retirement without pay shall be less than 30 per cent and more than 10 per cent permanent disability.

(b) The Veterans' Administration is hereby authorized and directed to review all claims heretofore filed under the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, and to remove from the rolls of retired emergency officers the names of such officers as are not found to be entitled to retirement under subdivision (a) of this section. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is further authorized and directed to cause to be certified to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, the names of those officers who are removed from the rolls, and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized and directed to drop from the emergency officers' retired list and the Army and Navy Registers the names of such officers. Payment of emergency officers' retired pay, in the case of any officer whose name is removed from the rolls or transferred to the list of those retired without pay by reason of the provisions of this section, shall cease on the first day of the third calendar month following the month during which certification or transfer is made, as the case may be. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to transfer the name of each officer removed from the rolls of those entitled to emergency officers' retired pay, to the compensation rolls of the Veterans' Administration, and to pay, commencing with the first day of the third calendar month following the month during which certification is made by the administrator of the name of the officer removed from the rolls, as herein provided, compensation in accordance with the provisions of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, notwithstanding that no previous application for compensation has been made.

(c) The review of all claims authorized and directed under subdivision (b) of this section shall be final, except for one reconsideration. No rerating or review shall thereafter be authorized in such claims.

(d) After the expiration of one year following the enactment of this act no review, appeal, or other consideration shall be authorized in connection with any claim for emergency officers' retirement upon which a decision has at any time been rendered by the Veterans' Administration or Bureau.

(e) No person shall be entitled to benefits under the provisions of this section, except he shall have made valid application under the provisions of the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928.

(f) All provisions of the emergency officers' retirement act of May 24, 1928, in conflict with or inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby modified and amended to the extent herein specifically provided and stated as of the date of enactment, May 24, 1928.

REPEAL OF PER DIEM ALLOWANCES

SEC. 904. Section 203 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, sec. 492), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 203. That every person applying for or in receipt of compensation for disability under the provisions of this title and every person applying for treatment under the provisions of subdivisions (9) or (10) of section 202 hereof, shall, as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required, submit himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician designated or approved by the administrator. He may have a duly qualified physician designated and paid by him present to participate in such examination. For all examinations he shall, in the discretion of the administrator, be paid his reasonable traveling and other expenses. If he shall neglect or refuse to submit to such examination, or shall in any way obstruct the same, his right to claim compensation under this title shall be suspended until such neglect, refusal, or obstruction ceases. No compensation shall be payable while such neglect, refusal, or obstruction continues, and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period."

LIMITATION OF RETROACTIVE BENEFITS

SEC. 905. Section 205 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 494), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 205. The Veterans' Administration may at any time review a claim for benefits under this act, or the laws governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions, and in accordance with the facts found and the law applicable, award, end, diminish, or increase allowance, compensation, or pension, but no allowance, compensation, or pension shall be awarded as a result of such review for any period more than six months prior to date of administrative determination. Where the time for appeal prescribed by regulations has expired a claimant may make application for review upon the evidence of record at the time of the last adjudicatory action but no allowance, compensation, or pension, or increased allowance, compensation, or pension, as a result of such review, shall be awarded for any period more than six months prior to date of application. No review of any claim shall be made except as provided herein. Except in cases of fraud participated in by the beneficiary, no reduction in allowance, compensation, or pension shall be made retroactive, and no reduction or discontinuance of allowance, compensation, or pension shall be effective until the first day of the third calendar month next succeeding that in which such reduction or discontinuance is determined. The proviso in the paragraph under the heading 'Pension Office,' in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes,' approved December 21, 1893 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 56), is hereby repealed: Provided, That as to those persons who served in the active military or naval forces and who actually suffered an injury or contracted a disease in line of duty and as the result of and directly attributable to combat with the enemy during war service, the limitations of this section shall not apply."

TRANSFER FROM COMPENSATION TO PENSION ROLLS

SEC. 906. The first paragraph of section 200 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, sec. 471), is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That where no active military or naval service was rendered between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, no compensation shall be payable for disability or death resulting from injury suffered or disease contracted during active service in an enlistment entered into after November 11, 1918, or for aggravation or recurrence of a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service, when such aggravation was suffered or contracted in, or such recurrence was caused by, the active military or naval service in an enlistment entered into after November 11, 1918: Provided further, That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the general pension rolls for the Regular Establishment the names of those persons in receipt of compensation who, by reason of the enactment of this amendatory act are no longer entitled to compensation, and to pay such persons pension in accordance with the rates provided for under the general pension laws, but this transfer shall not take effect until six months following the date of the enactment of this amendatory act: Provided further, That this act, as amended, and the laws governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions shall not be construed to deny the right of any person to receive pension on account of active military or naval service subsequent to November 11, 1918: Provided further, That the provisions of section 602 of this act, as amended, shall not be construed to authorize the payment of compensation contrary to the provisions of this amendatory act."

TESTIMONY IN SUITS UPON INSURANCE CLAIMS

SEC. 907. The first paragraph of section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, sec. 445), is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

"Provided further, That in any suit tried under the provisions of this section the court shall not receive, admit, or entertain the testimony of any person whose statement has not been submitted to the United States Veterans' Bureau or the Veterans' Administration prior to the denial of the claim sued upon, and the date of issuance of the letter of disagreement required by this section shall be the date of denial of the claim, except that if in a preliminary proceeding prior to trial of the claim sued upon, it is shown by the plaintiff to the satisfaction of the court that relevant and material testimony is available from any person whose statement has not been submitted to the United States Veterans' Bureau or the Veterans' Administration prior to the denial of the claim sued upon, the court shall stay all proceedings in the suit until the statement of such person is submitted to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs who shall cause the claim to be immediately reviewed, and in case the administrator allows such claim, the suit shall be dismissed, but if the administrator disallows the claim, such person may be a witness in the trial of the cause: Provided further, That the last preceding proviso shall apply to all suits pending on the date of the enactment of this amendatory act against the United States under the provisions of the war risk insurance act, as amended, or this act, as amended."

REVIVAL OF GOVERNMENT INSURANCE RESTRICTED

SEC. 908. Sections 305 and 309 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 38, secs. 516, 516b), are hereby repealed as of the date of their enactment, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 602 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 571), no additional payments shall be made under such sections or the third proviso of section 408 of the war risk insurance act, as amended, except to those persons actually receiving payments on the date of enactment of this act, or in those claims where, prior to the date of the enactment of this act, it has been determined by the Veterans' Administration that all or part of the insurance is payable under such sections and the interested person or persons entitled thereto have been informed of such determination: Provided, That where a beneficiary receiving insurance payments under such sections dies and there is surviving a widow, child or children, or dependent mother or father, of the veteran, the remaining unpaid installments shall be paid to the following permitted class of beneficiaries in the following order of preference: (1) To the widow of the veteran if living at date of death of the beneficiary; (2) if no widow, then to the child or children of the veteran, share and share alike; (3) if no wife, child, or children, then to the dependent mother of the veteran; (4) if no wife, child or children, or dependent mother, then to the dependent father of the veteran, but no payments under this proviso shall be made to the heirs or legal representatives of any beneficiaries in the permitted class who die before receiving the monthly installments to which they are entitled, and the remaining unpaid installments shall be paid to the beneficiary or beneficiaries in the order of preference prescribed in this proviso: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to affect any claim wherein it is determined by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the insured actually contracted disease or suffered injury in line of duty between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, inclusive, as the result of and directly attributable to actual combat with the enemy during war service, and as the result of such disease or injury, dies or has died or becomes or has become permanently and totally disabled, and as to those cases adjudication shall be made under the law in effect prior to the enactment of this act, in the same manner as if this act had not been enacted, except that the first proviso of section 305 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, limiting the class of beneficiaries, shall be applicable to any case payable under this section: Provided further, That the uncollected compensation available under the provisions of the law in effect prior to the enactment of this act must be based upon disease or injury as described in this section.

LIMITATION UPON ATTORNEYS' FEES IN INSURANCE SUITS

SEC. 909. The proviso preceding the last sentence in section 500 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 551), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Provided, however, That wherever a judgment or decree shall be rendered in an action brought pursuant to section 19 of Title I of this act the court, as a part of its judgment or decree, shall determine and allow reasonable fees for the attorneys of the successful party or parties and apportion same if proper, said fees not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount found due under the judgment or decree and to be paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the payment made under the judgment or decree."

JOINT COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' LAWS

SEC. 910. There is hereby created a joint congressional committee which shall be composed of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Such committee shall conduct a thorough investigation of the operation of the laws and regulations relating to the relief of veterans of all wars and persons receiving benefits on account of service of such veterans and report a national policy with respect to such veterans and their dependents. The committee shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives not later than February 1, 1933, the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

The committee is authorized to sit and act, whether or not the Senate or House of Representatives is in session, at such times and places as it may deem advisable, and to call upon various departments of the Government for such information and for such clerical assistance as may be necessary, using the services of employees on the Government pay roll.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—NATIONAL DEFENSE REORGANIZATION ACT

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the proposed consolidation of the Department of War and the Department of the Navy embodied in title 6 of the pending bill. I am opposed to it as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which, after almost 300 pages of hearings, by emphatic vote, recorded its opposition to the consolidation. I am opposed to it on broad policy and for the very simple reason that in my judgment its proponents have failed entirely to date to sustain the burden of proof which is rightly theirs. They have failed to show any substantial economy not otherwise obtainable. They have failed to show that consolidation can be effected without risk of impairment of national defense as a whole.

The testimony of proponents of consolidation appearing before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments was entirely inconclusive and for the most part sheer generalization. It is true that our colleague from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS], stated to the committee that he was prepared to stake such reputation as he then enjoyed that savings amounting to one hundred millions of dollars could be realized through consolidation in a comparatively short time. He filed no bill of particulars, however. He offered no evidence as a basis for any such opinion. No authoritative evidence was offered by any witness of substantial economy through consolidation which could not be effected without it. Opponents of consolidation characterized the suggested savings as absurd. They referred to substantial savings already effected in each of the two departments, to further and substantial savings resulting from cooperation between the departments, and indicated that in their opinion the suggested consolidation might well result in an actual increase rather than a decrease in expenditure.

Proponents of consolidation had little to offer the committee in respect to possible injury to our system of national defense other than their individual opinions that no impairment would result. Opponents of consolidation brought to the committee a wealth of opinion from important nations in the world, indicating a serious risk of impairment if the proposed consolidation should be adopted.

In Great Britain, for example, in March of 1931, a committee on national expenditure was appointed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the request of Parliament, to make recommendations for effecting forthwith all practicable and legitimate reductions in the national expenditure consistent with the efficiency of the services. The committee was composed of a very able body of men under the chairmanship of Sir George Ernest May. Their report was submitted in July of 1931. Here is what the committee had to say in respect to consolidation such as is now proposed:

We have given very careful consideration to this question, because there is undoubtedly a widespread impression in the public mind that large savings might be made in the cost of national defense by some form of amalgamation of the three services under a single minister. We are, of course, primarily interested in the question from the point of view of its effect on the actual cost of the fighting services, but we can not forget that in the search for true economy it is essential to take the wider view and consider the effect of any far-reaching change of system on the efficiency of the service.

Our conclusion, after careful review of all the evidence, is that no substantial reduction of cost would follow from the creation of a ministry of national defense, and that, on the contrary, there would be a serious risk that the efficiency of the services might be impaired by the alteration of system involved. We have therefore rejected any idea of economy by this method, and we hope that our conclusion will be accepted as finally disposing of the suggestion that millions of money could be saved by the formation of a ministry of defense.

A similar finding in Great Britain was reached in 1922 by a committee set up by the British Cabinet under the chairmanship of Sir Alfred Mond to make proposals for amalgamation of the common services of the navy, army, and air force, such as intelligence, supply, transport, education, medical, chaplains, and any other overlapping departments in order to reduce the cost of the existing triplicate system. I quote from the report of the committee:

After a preliminary discussion, we were disposed to think that by the complete amalgamation of some of the common services, if practicable, substantial economies could be effected. After careful consideration we came to the conclusion that the amalgamation of the common services of the three departments is not advisable, and we doubt if any substantial economies would therein be effected.

Our own findings have been to the same effect. Two congressional committees have investigated the matter within the past eight years. Neither recommended consolidation. The so-called Morrow board, appointed in 1925 and consisting of nine members under the chairmanship of the late Hon. Dwight W. Morrow, with representation from both Senate and House, also investigated the matter thoroughly. By unanimous vote the committee recorded its opposition to the proposed consolidation. I quote from the report of the committee:

We do not recommend a department of national defense, either as comprising the Army and the Navy or as comprising three coordinate departments of Army, Navy, and Air. The disadvantages outweigh the advantages.

Should there be formed a separate department for air, coordinate with the present departments of War and Navy?

Our answer is no.

The quoted opinion of General Pershing and the direct testimony of General Summerall, General Hines, and General Ely, of Admiral Sims, Admiral Eberle, Admiral Robison, Admiral Coontz, and Admiral Hughes stressed the need of the Army and of the Navy for their own services. Modern military and naval operations can not be effectively conducted without such services acting as integral parts of a single command. Moreover, the training of these air services that are to act with the Army and with the Navy must be under the continuous direction and control of the command which is ultimately to use them. In these conclusions and principles we concur.

The experience of the world generally speaking is opposed to consolidation. No great country with problems similar to our own has embarked on a permanent policy of consolidation. It is true that the Government of France has recently attempted consolidation by decree, but the attempt is of such recent date as to be entitled to consideration only as an experiment and is said to be the source of acrimonious discussion at this time in Parliament and elsewhere.

The Secretary of War is opposed to consolidation. The Secretary of the Navy is opposed to it. The Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, and many others whose experience and qualifications fit them to give expert testimony in the matter are unalterably opposed to it. The brilliant officer who now serves as Chief of Staff of the Army goes so far in a letter addressed to a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments as to state that he knows of "no responsible soldier or sailor in the whole gamut of history who has advocated such a plan as is now proposed." He writes as follows:

You have asked for an informal expression of my views concerning the project for amalgamating the War and Navy Departments into a single bureau of government.

No other measure proposed in recent years seems to me to be fraught with such potential possibilities of disaster for the United States as is this one. The proven agencies which have successfully conducted this country through six wars in a period of 125 years are now under the apparent dictation of a measure of economy to be launched on an adventure which, under certain conditions, might involve the very life of the Nation.

Not only the military history of this country but of every other country gives indisputable proof of the advantages of maintaining in time of war the integral control of the two great branches of national defense—the Army and the Navy. Each must be free to perform its mission unhindered by any centralized and ponderous bureaucratic control. To those who have had practical experience in the conduct of war this principle is so basic and clear that it seems almost impossible that serious thought could be given to any other arrangement. I know of no responsible soldier or sailor in the whole gamut of history who has advocated such a plan as is now proposed. From the beginning of armies and navies the whole mass of testimony, not only of the great captains of history but of all those students who have written upon the subject, has been practically unanimous in this matter. When the Congress of the United States in 1798, for specific and cogent reasons, abandoned the unsuccessful attempt to administer the two great fighting services through a single department, it was but conforming to the lessons of history, to the accumulated experience of civilized peoples, and to the dictates of logic. Fighting on the sea and fighting on the land have no elements in common, except in so far as they are both engaged in the ultimate mission of victory. Separate commanders, specialized staffs, particularized training, and individual supply arrangements must remain as essentials for each. I will not attempt to burden you with a repetition of the manifold arguments along this line which have already been advanced. I merely wish to emphasize that I give it as my fixed opinion that such an amalgamation as proposed would endanger victory for the United States in case of war.

As I understand it, however, the motivation of the proposition is not efficiency but economy. This feature of the subject has been discussed for weeks by your committee, and by other similar groups at various periods during the past decade, yet I challenge anyone to show a single major line of operation along which important economies could be effected without dangerously impairing efficiency. The proponents of economy have been unable to develop a concrete program outlining its factors. The basic hope they have advanced seems to be built upon the thought that the amalgamation will do away with certain overhead expenses. Small and trivial concrete cases have been cited of possible overlapping, and from these trivialities an opinion has been expressed that great economies may be accomplished by their elimination. The contrary result would obtain. Formation of the great organization proposed would not materially lessen the necessity for the separate logistical, administrative, and training staffs now existing, but would at once attract to itself a group of officers, civil officials, clerks, and others, which would probably exceed in cost and size during the course of time anything that this Nation has ever experienced.

The history of government demonstrates that the parasitical development of bureaucracy springs from the setting up of superfluous échelons of control, such as the one proposed. Although I recognize the possibility of effecting relatively unimportant economies in isolated activities, the ultimate cost of this superimposed structure would, in my opinion, exceed by millions any economies that could be safely effected. The super-Cabinet officer at its head could not fail to be the acquisitor of one of the largest and undoubtedly the most powerful governmental organizations the United States has ever known. New buildings, new schools for the training of the composite soldier-sailor, new staffs, all with their additional cost, would be built up at the top of such a groupment. Rather than economy, this amalgamation would, in my opinion, represent one of the greatest debauches of extravagance that any nation has ever known.

The nations of the world have not all been wrong for all time. If it had been advantageous for governments to accomplish such organization as is now suggested, it would have been done decades, or even centuries, ago. The ingenuity of man has never found such outlet in any other channel as in that concerning war. This bill would run counter to the experience of the world.

I can not emphasize too strongly the inadvisability of the serious consideration of this change in the face of the international situation that now exists. The instability, the uncertainty, the loss of morale among the combatant forces that would be entailed by acrimonious discussions along this line, seem to me to be fraught with such peril to the Government that even if everything that were said in favor of this bill by its proponents were true, I still would give my most solemn counsel to suspend action until the world has reached a condition of approximate normalcy.

I am not going to burden you with a further detailed discussion, but this note represents the epitome of my professional opinion in accordance with your verbal request. Pass this bill and every potential enemy of the United States will rejoice.

In the light of opinion of this character, in the light of experience at home and abroad, in the light of the testimony at the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, it is impossible for me to support the proposed consolidation.

Under title 4 of the bill under consideration the House has authorized the President, by Executive order subject to veto by either Senate or House, to reorganize, consolidate, or eliminate existing Federal agencies or their functions. This should make possible the elimination of minor duplications of activity or expense by the two departments.

To adopt the proposed consolidation is to embark upon a radical change of policy in our system of national defense. To make this radical change at this time in the absence of convincing proof of substantial economy not otherwise obtainable without injury to our national defense is, in my judgment, foolhardy. Considerations of economy can not be allowed to jeopardize adequate national defense. The present time is no time for crippling the organization upon which the safety and very life of the Nation may depend.

I hope sincerely that the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Oregon, General MARTIN, striking from the bill the whole of title 6, providing for consolidation of the Department of War and the Department of the Navy, will prevail.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. BOYLAN, indefinitely, on account of illness; and

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw a bill that was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary April 26, H. R. 11640. It was introduced by error of a clerk in my office.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been introduced, referred to the committee, printed, and sent to the libraries all over the country. The Chair does not see what the gentleman can accomplish by withdrawing it. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is not here, and I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for the present.

Mr. TINKHAM. I will withhold the request.

Mr. McDUFFIE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Under the rules of the House, can we by unanimous consent proceed with this legislation on next Monday?

The SPEAKER. The House can do almost anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the economy program on Monday next and set aside unanimous-consent day.

Mr. CONNERY. Reserving the right to object, I have heard Members who have left say that this bill would not be taken up again until next Tuesday.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understood the Speaker to announce that next Monday was unanimous-consent day.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous-consent and suspension day.
